PREFACE.

THE publication of THE IMPERIAL DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE, as edited by Dr. Ogilvie, was commenced in January, 1847, and completed in the same month of the year 1850; in 1854 the publication of the Supplement was begun, and it was finished the following year (1855). This work was based on the American dictionary of Noah Webster, LL.D., the edition employed being that published in 1841, the last which received amendments from the hands of the author himself. The modifications and improvements introduced by Dr. Ogilvie, though great and important, did not materially alter the scope and character of the work, farther than to the extent of giving it more of an encyclopædic form and of greatly increasing its value as a repertory of technological and scientific terms; the total number of entries having been increased to about 100,000, being 20,000 more than were contained in the work on which it was based.

An important and highly useful feature which distinguished this work very much from all other English Dictionaries was the employment of pictorial illustrations in the text. The idea of using pictorial illustrations in this manner seems to have originated with the well-known dictionary of Nathan Bailey, a certain number of woodcuts, chiefly explanatory of heraldic and mathematical terms, being inserted in the edition of his dictionary published in 1726–27 (2 vols. 8vo), while a greater number was inserted in later editions. In no previous English Dictionary, however, was this aid to the elucidation of definitions and descriptions carried into effect so thoroughly and systematically as in Ogilvie's Imperial Dictionary. In such high estimation was this new feature held that the publishers of Webster's American Dictionary speedily followed the example thus set before them, and introduced pictorial illustrations into that work also, and in doing so copied and reproduced one after another the greater number of the figures given in the Imperial. In fact wherever in Webster and the Imperial the same illustrative figure appears, the original is uniformly the one to be found in the latter work. Other dictionaries, both in this country and America, have followed the same example.

In this form the Imperial Dictionary was before the public for more than a quarter of a century, and was widely accepted as a standard lexicon of the English language, and as one of the most useful for the purposes of general reference and everyday requirement; the latter fact being amply attested by its continuous and steady sale over that somewhat lengthened period of years.

But the never-ceasing process of growth, change, and expansion—to which the English, like all other living languages, is subject—having gone on with increasing rapidity since the first publication of this work, it had at length ceased to be sufficient for all requirements. This, of course, was natural in a time of great intellectual activity, when hosts of new words and terms connected with all departments of human thought and action have come into everyday use, much new light being also thrown on the etymology and history of English words, and the literature of the country being more generally and more thoroughly studied than previously. Hence, as the time seemed rapidly approaching when it would be desirable to bring out the Imperial Dictionary in an improved form, the necessary work of revision and extension was taken in hand, and by the labours of the present editor and others associated with him was brought to a completion. The Imperial Dictionary in its new form appeared in 1882–3, was received with the utmost favour, and was recognized as substantially a New Work. Since then it has been subjected to further revision and enlargement in order to keep it abreast of present-day requirements. In particular each of the four volumes has been provided with a supplement, containing new words, terms, and definitions; and several extensive and most valuable appendices have been added, giving information of a kind not previously issued in connection with any English dictionary.

The additions made to the vocabulary naturally consist largely of terms belonging to science, technology, and the arts in general; but besides these there have been inserted great numbers of words used by modern poets and prose writers, as well as by writers of all kinds from the sixteenth century to the present time, but not hitherto brought together in any one dictionary. Other additions that may be particularly mentioned are Scotch words used by Burns, Sir Walter Scott, and other writers, together with numerous provincial English words; many Americanisms; and such foreign words as are frequently met with in English books. It has been thought right to include also a large number of the colloquialisms and even slang words and phrases so freely used in modern literature of the lighter class, and frequently heard in conversation, though of course attention has been drawn to their somewhat peculiar standing and character. With a view to collecting suitable additions wherewith to enrich the vocabulary, numerous works both literary and scientific have been specially read by the editorial staff and others.

Had a mere increase in the number of separate entries been deemed of special importance, this result might easily have been achieved, and an appearance of greater copiousness imparted. In the first place the number of entries of compound words might have been increased by embodying many of the most obvious signification which have been omitted. It will be readily understood, however, that there is some difficulty in drawing any hard-and-fast line with regard to the insertion of words of this kind, and the tendency has rather been to inclusion than to exclusion. Again, participles are not inserted as separate words when they are merely forms of verbs, and when there is no irregularity in their formation; thus, walking, walked have no entries, but done, made, seen have. When, however, they also form adjectives, and are used in senses diverging from those of their verbs, participles are entered separately. Thus, loving is inserted as an adjective, because we speak of loving words, loving looks, &c. So verbal nouns in -ing are not entered when they express nothing more than the mere act expressed by their primitive; but when they have a concrete meaning or denote important operations (as the word engraving), they are defined in a separate article. It must also be understood that, with the exception of Chaucerian words, comparatively few words will be found in this Dictionary that are peculiar to writers before the sixteenth century (say the year 1550), the earlier period of the language not falling within its scope. To have inserted words and forms from all periods of the language would certainly have greatly increased the copiousness of the vocabulary but at same time the bulk and price of the work, without thereby imparting a corresponding increase of value for the vast majority of readers.

Great pains have been taken to ensure that this Dictionary shall adequately fulfil what may be called the literary functions of a dictionary. As a literary dictionary its aim is to supply a key to the written works in the language, and to serve as an aid to the use of the language itself, by registering, defining, and explaining the various meanings which are or have been attached to words by writers both new and old, by explaining idiomatic phrases and peculiar constructions, by distinguishing obsolete from current meanings and usages, as well as obsolete and obsolescent from current words, by marking whether words or meanings are poetical, colloquial, rare, provincial, and the like, and by carefully distinguishing between words closely synonymous in signification.

The words here more especially referred to are those belonging to the domain of literature as distinct from the domain of science and the arts—the words that form the bones and sinews of the English language, and give it its special character as a means for the expression of thought. All the articles on such words—comprising innumerable verbs, nouns, adjectives, adverbs, prepositions, &c.—have been thoroughly revised, and great alterations have been made on the definitions formerly given. By this process meanings similar but really different have been more clearly defined and distinguished from each other, the work has been enriched by numerous additional meanings and phrases, and greater conciseness, clearness, and precision generally have been attained; while various omissions and oversights in reference to grammatical and other peculiarities or usages have been detected and rectified. The discrimination of synonyms has been carried out on an extensive scale, and must prove a useful feature, as no doubt will also the grouping of a number of synonymous, or nearly synonymous, expressions under all the principal words.

This Dictionary will be found to be rich in illustrative quotations. Such quotations, as showing the real meanings of words and exemplifying the grammatical constructions in which they enter, are of the utmost value, and many thousands have been added in the present edition, from modern poets, novelists, historians, essayists, critics, &c., as well as from standard writers of an older date. In selecting illustrative passages preference has generally been given to such as are interesting in themselves, either from the thought conveyed or from the language in which it is clothed, and thus many of the most notable utterances of the best English writers will be found interspersed through the pages of the book. Other extracts, again, contain valuable information from trustworthy authorities on the subjects in regard to which they have been adduced.

By the encyclopædic method of treatment adopted in the work the advantages of an ordinary dictionary and those of an encyclopædia are combined. This method is the only one of real value so far as concerns a vast number of words belonging to the arts and sciences, to theology, philosophy, law, politics, manners and customs, &c., the majority of terms of this description being such that it is impossible to elucidate them satisfactorily by means of a bare definition, since such a definition, however exact in itself, often conveys little real information respecting the subject defined. For instance, under the word Steam-engine, this Dictionary does not stop short after defining it as "an engine worked by steam;" it gives a brief account of the principle, construction, and action of the steam-engine, some particulars regarding the various kinds of engines, and a succinct account of the history of this invention, and the article is illustrated by a pictorial representation of a condensing engine, having explanatory references to all the principal parts. So also with regard to Horse. To say with Dr. Johnson that it is "a neighing quadruped used in war, and draught, and carriage" is to add little or nothing to any one's knowledge. But in this Dictionary a small article is devoted to the horse, giving some general and scientific particulars regarding the animal and its different breeds, accompanied by an engraving which explains graphically such terms as "crest," "withers," "pastern," &c.

In regard to a great many words falling under this category the aid of the draughtsman and engraver has been called in to supplement the written definitions. The engraved figures, about four thousand in number, scattered over the pages of the work testify to the value of this mode of conveying information, besides adding much to the beauty of the volumes. These important advantages have not been attained without the expenditure of an amount of care, time, and labour, which a simple inspection of the figures on the pages does not render easily apparent. But when it is considered that each figure represents a fact which no invention could supply, it is at once perceived that the providing of these pictorial facts, and the research required to obtain them in such form as would really illustrate the definitions, must have entailed no ordinary amount of labour, more especially in view of the great multiplicity of subjects that had to be thus treated. The selection and arrangement of the illustrations for both the present and the former edition, have been almost exclusively the work of Mr. Robert Blackie. The replacements and new figures added in this edition extend to about one half of the whole.

While aiming at comprehensiveness and catholicity in the admission of words and terms, this Dictionary does not profess to contain all those belonging to every art and science, nor will these ever be found all collected together in any one Dictionary; yet it certainly contains far more than the generality of readers are ever likely to meet with. It will be found especially full in the departments of Zoology, Botany, Geology, Mineralogy, Mathematics, Chemistry, Physics, Astronomy, Anatomy, Medicine and Surgery, Archæology, Architecture, Engineering, Machinery, Manufactures, Agriculture, and Commerce. Among the words belonging to the department of natural history it has been thought advisable to include the Latin or semi-Latinized names of the principal orders, families, genera, &c., both of the animal and the vegetable kingdom. To secure accuracy in the definition of scientific terms, and correctness generally in the treatment of scientific subjects, the articles belonging to the various sciences have been carefully revised by men eminent for their attainments in the respective branches.

The advance that the science of comparative philology has made during the last twenty-five or thirty years, and the numerous recent investigations into the philology and history of the English language and other kindred tongues, rendered it necessary that the etymological portion of the work should be entirely remodelled. This has accordingly been done, and full use has been made of the labours of both English and foreign philologists and etymologists in effecting the requisite changes. The aim has always been to state in a concise form such facts regarding the derivations of the various words as might suffice to meet the wants of inquirers in general, and to avoid such extended treatment as could only be appreciated by persons having some special knowledge of philology. Articles on the principal prefixes and affixes will be found at their proper places registered alphabetically throughout the work, and some interesting and useful facts are given in the articles dealing with the various letters of the alphabet.

The Pronunciation has been inserted throughout according to the best usage, the words in all cases being re-spelled according to a simple and easily intelligible system of transliteration. As the pronunciation of certain words cannot be said to be settled, alternative pronunciations have been given in cases where more than one seemed to be well established. In order to meet the wants of a large number of readers, lists of Greek, Latin, Scriptural and other ancient Proper Names, and of Modern Geographical Names, with their pronunciation suitably marked have been appended, besides several other useful lists.

It is unnecessary to mention by name the various publications from which aid has been derived in bringing this Dictionary into its present form. All the most recent and important lexicographical works, as well as others of an earlier date, have contributed something of value, and great assistance has been derived from some of them, as well as from concordances, vocabularies, grammatical and other works; while in revising and drawing up the encyclopædic articles, the most recent and most trustworthy encyclopædias home and foreign, and the newest works treating of particular branches of knowledge, have been consulted.

Notwithstanding the expenditure of much care and labour, it is not to be supposed that the present work can be perfect, or even free from various errors and defects; but it is believed that the imperfections of the Imperial Dictionary will not be found more in number or greater in magnitude than might reasonably be expected to occur in an undertaking of such extent, and so difficult and so laborious in execution. The hope, indeed, may confidently be expressed that the work as a whole will, for many years, prove sufficient to meet the wants of all classes of English readers, and will rarely disappoint the expectations of those who consult its pages.

EXPLANATIONS

REGARDING PRONUNCIATION AND CHEMICAL SYMBOLS.

PRONUNCIATION.

In showing the pronunciation the simplest and most easily understood method has been adopted, that of re-writing the word in a different form. In doing so the same letter or combination of letters is made use of for the same sound, no matter by what letter or letters the sound may be expressed in the principal word. The key by this means is greatly simplified, the reader having only to bear in mind one mark for each sound.

Vowels.

ā,	as in fate.	o,	as in not.
ä,	" far.	ō,	" move.
ē,	" me.	u̇,	" bull.
e,	" met.	ü,	" Sc. abune (Fr. u).
ė,	" her.	oi,	" oil.
ī,	" pine.	ou,	" pound.
i,	" pin.	ÿ,	" Sc. fey (=e+i).
ō,	" note.

Consonants.

ch,	as in chain.	TH,	as in then.
čh,	" Sc. loch, Ger. nacht.	th,	" thin.
j,	" job.	w,	" wig.

The application of this key to the pronunciation of foreign words can as a rule only represent approximately the true pronunciation of those words. It is applicable, however, to Latin and Greek words, as those languages are pronounced in England.

Accent.—Words consisting of more than one syllable receive an accent, as the first syllable of the word labour, the second of delay, and the third of comprehension. The accented syllable is the most prominent part of the word, being made so by means of the accent. In this dictionary it is denoted by the mark ′. This mark, called an accent, is placed above and beyond the syllable which receives the accent, as in the words la′bour, delay′, and comprehen′sion.

Many polysyllabic words are pronounced with two accents, the primary and the secondary accent, as the word excommunication, in which the third, as well as the fifth syllable is commonly accented. The accent on the fifth syllable is the primary, true, or tonic accent, while that on the third is a mere euphonic accent, and consists of a slight resting on the syllable to prevent indistinctness in the utterance of so many unaccented syllables. Where both accents are marked in a word, the primary accent is thus marked ″, and the secondary, or inferior one, by this mark ′, as in the word excommu′nica″tion.

CHEMICAL ELEMENTS AND SYMBOLS.

By means of chemical symbols, or formulas, the composition of the most complicated substances can be very easily expressed, and that, too, in a very small compass. An abbreviated expression of this kind often gives, in a single line, more information as to details than could be given in many lines of letterpress.

Elements.	Symbols.
Aluminium	Al
Antimony (Stibium)	Sb
Arsenic	As
Barium	Ba
Bismuth	Bi

Uranium	U
Vanadium	V
Yttrium	Y
Zinc	Zn
Zirconium	Zr

When any of the above symbols stands by itself it indicates one atom of the element it represents. Thus, H stands for one atom of hydrogen, O for one atom of oxygen, and Cl for one atom of chlorine. (See Atom, and Atomic theory under Atomic, in Dictionary.)

When a symbol has a small figure or number underwritten, and to the right of it, such figure or number indicates the number of atoms of the element. Thus—O_2 signifies two atoms of oxygen, S_5 five atoms of sulphur, and C_{10} ten atoms of carbon.

When two or more elements are united to form a chemical compound, their symbols are written one after the other, to indicate the compound. Thus—H_2O means water, a compound of two atoms of hydrogen and one of oxygen; $C_{12}H_{22}O_{11}$ indicates cane-sugar, a compound of twelve atoms of carbon, twenty-two of hydrogen, and eleven of oxygen.

These two expressions as they stand denote respectively a molecule of the substance they represent, that is, the smallest possible quantity of it capable of existing in the free state. To express several molecules a large figure is prefixed, thus: $2H_2O$ represents two molecules of water, $4(C_{12}H_{22}O_{11})$ four molecules of cane-sugar.

When a compound is formed of two or more compounds the symbolical expressions for the compound are usually connected together by a comma; thus, the crystallized magnesic sulphate is $MgSO_4, 7H_2O$. The symbols may also be used to express the changes which occur during chemical action, and they are then written in the form of an equation, of which one side represents the substances as they exist before the change, the other the result of the reaction. Thus, $2H_2 + O_2 = 2H_2O$ expresses the fact that two molecules of hydrogen, each containing two atoms, and one of oxygen, also containing two atoms, combine to give two molecules of water, each of them containing two atoms of hydrogen and one of oxygen.

THE IMPERIAL DICTIONARY

OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

A, the first letter in the English alphabet, as well as in the other alphabets derived from the Greek and Latin and ultimately from the Phœnician. As an alphabetical character it represents in English written and printed words a number of different vowel sounds, of which several at least would, in a more perfect alphabet, be represented by separate characters. Its principal sounds are those heard (1) in far, father; (2) man, cat; (3) fall, walk; (4) mate, pare. Of these sounds the first (which we may call the ah-sound) is the oldest and the one that may be said to belong most legitimately to the character, being the one also which, approximately at least, attaches to it in most other languages. This is one of those that are considered to be the primary and original vowel sounds of the Indo-European languages—the vowel sounds of the parent speech from which the separate languages are descended. It is, perhaps, the simplest of all the vowel sounds, being formed by a simple opening of the mouth and utterance of voice, accompanied by a gentle depression of the back part of the tongue. It is more distinctly vocal than either i or u, these latter having a close affinity with and tendency to merge into the consonantal sounds of y and w, while its vocal character is always unmistakable. It is also regarded as a stronger and more primitive sound than i and u, which, when we trace the history of words, have in a great many instances been found to arise from a weakening of an original ah-sound, while a change in the opposite direction is very rare. The other two vowels, e and o, it may be remarked are still later in character than i and u: the former comes midway between a and i if we change the position of the vocal organs gradually from that necessary for the ah-sound to that necessary for i, and in like manner o comes midway between a and u. Many English words exemplify the change of an original ah-sound to some other vowel sound, as for instance, is, do, mother, brother, kin, thin, &c., in all which the root-vowel was originally a. The ah-sound (with which may be ranked the slightly different vocal sound in fast, grant, &c.) now occurs in few English words, in far fewer certainly than in Anglo-Saxon and later, though to what extent the sound formerly prevailed is somewhat difficult to decide. In Anglo-Saxon the letter a represented at least two principal sounds, a shorter and a longer (the latter often marked with an accent). The shorter was no doubt similar in quality to the a of father, though shorter. Many words in which this sound occurred might be written indifferently with o; thus monn as well as mann, hond as well as hand, fram or from, &c. The long or accented a (á, â) had no doubt the same sound as a in father, though perhaps it may have also had a sound similar to our a in fall. This á often represents an older diphthongal aí seen in Gothic; thus A. Sax. hâm, home = Goth. haim, G. heim; A. Sax. hlâf, a loaf = Goth. hlaif. In modern English it has most commonly passed into long o—comp. A. Sax. hâm, E. home; A. Sax. lâr, E. lore; A. Sax. râd, E. road, &c. The sound of a in fall is now met with in a large number of English words, especially before l; it forms an intermediate step in pronunciation between the ah-sound in father and the o in home. The same sound is also represented by the combinations au, aw, as in vault, claw, which are only diphthongs in appearance. There is also a short sound corresponding to this, namely, that heard in what, want, quality. Intermediate between the ah-sound and the e-sound comes the sound of a in man, now one of those most commonly represented by this character. It is a comparatively modern and peculiarly English modification of the ah-sound, difficult for foreigners to acquire. In Anglo-Saxon this sound, or a sound very similar, was represented by æ, as in glæd = E. glad; bæc, E. back. The same character was also frequently used to represent our short e-sound, as in A. Sax. lædde = E. led; A. Sax. læssa = E. less. It seems often to have represented a local and especially a southern modification of the fuller ah-sound, thus father, one of the few words in which the old ah-sound is still pronounced, was in the Anglo-Saxon of the south written fæder, in the north fadur, fader. This character was hardly used after the beginning of the thirteenth century, being replaced as a rule either by a with the ah-sound or by e. The æ-sound (a in man) thus to some extent gave place to the ah-sound, though in modern times it has more than regained its footing. There was also a long or accented æ; it has now commonly become ee, or the same sound. Another very common sound of a is what is often called the long or name sound of the letter, that which it has namely when before a final consonant with e mute, as in mare, bare, mate, pale. Here the final e serves merely to mark the modification of the sound of the a, which thus resembles in character as in sound the German a modified (ä or á). Strictly speaking the a of mare, bare, differs from that of mate, pale, the former being a pure vowel, while the latter, according to what is considered the correct pronunciation, is not a true vowel, but diphthongal in character, a slight i being heard after the a or rather e sound. These are the chief varieties of sound which this letter has to represent. Less important are the sounds heard in any, many, and the obscure sound heard in rîband, and in the final a of America. Though a very common letter, a occurs as a final only in the words flea, tea, pea, plea, sea, tea, yea. Formerly (in Anglo-Saxon) it was common enough in this position. Nor is it ever doubled, in which respect it resembles i and u.—This letter often stands in abbreviations, as in A.D., for anno domini (in the year of our Lord), A.B., A.M., artium baccalaureus, and artium magister, bachelor and master of arts.

A, indefinite art., the form of an used before consonants and words beginning with a consonant sound; as, a man, a woman, a year, a union, a eulogy, a oneness. This form first appears about the beginning of the thirteenth century. It is placed before nouns of the singular number, and also before plural nouns when few or great many is interposed. In such phrases as a hundred a year, a pound a head, it more clearly retains its power as a numeral, and is practically equal to the distributive pronoun each. See further under AN.

A, as a prefix, or initial and generally inseparable particle, is a relic of both Teutonic and Classical particles. 1. As a Teutonic prefix it is of very heterogeneous origin, and in particular cases there is often difficulty in determining with certainty to what older particle or particles it must be referred. It often represents prepositions, especially on, A. Sax. on, an, as in aback (A. Sax. onbæc, and also gebæc), amidst (A. Sax. on middan), asleep ('fell on sleep,' Acts xiii. 36), afoot (also on foot), aboard (also on board), aloft (on loft in Chaucer), alive (on live in Chaucer), asunder (A. Sax. onsundran), &c. This is also the separable prefix a- that is prefixed to verbal nouns, as in a-hunting, a-fishing. It is doubtful, however, whether the a- in all these words directly represents the A. Sax. on; it seems rather to represent the Icel. á, on, upon, which is of course etymologically the same word (comp. Icel. á baki, aback, á lopti, aloft, á lîfi, alive, &c.). Another preposition represented by it is of (A. Sax. of, af), as in adown (A. Sax. of dûne), off the down or height, downwards. In a-days (in now-a-days) and in a-nights it represents an of with a somewhat different meaning. In afore it represents at (A. Sax. æfore). Prefixed to verbs it represents the A. Sax. particle á, which was often prefixed with an intensive force, as in arise, awake, arouse, but in many cases it is difficult to discern any distinction in meaning between the compound and the simple word. The particle ge was similarly used, and in abide, abear, the a may represent either. The initial syllable in aright, aware, &c., appears to be of the same doubtful origin. In ago, aby, the a represents the old A. Sax. particle á in another sense, namely, that of away, back. In ashamed, afeared, it represents an old intensive of. Eng. among represents the A. Sax. amang, ommang, ongemang, gemang; along represents andlang, endlong, gelang; and- here = Goth. anda, back, an- in answer. 2. As a classical or Romance prefix it represents: (a) L. ad, to; as, ascend, from ad, and scando, to climb. (b) L. a or ab, from; as, avert, from a, and verto, to turn. (c) L. e or ex, out of; as, amend (Fr. amender, from L. emendare, compounded of e or ex, and menda, a fault). (d) Gr. a, neg. or priv.; as, amorphous, from a, not, and morphē, shape; anonymous, from a, not, and onoma, a name.

A, in music, the name of the sixth note of the model or natural diatonic scale of C; the la of continental musicians. It is the first note in the relative minor scale. It is the note sounded by the open second string of the violin, and to it as given by a fixed toned instrument (say the oboe or organ) all the instruments of the orchestra are tuned.

A. 1. (With short sound.) An old (and also a modern vulgar) corruption for he, have, I, &c.; as,

A babbled of green fields. Shak.

I had not thought my body could a yielded. Beau. & Fl.

2. (With long sound.) Scotch or Northern English for all.

A1. 1. A combination of characters applied to a vessel of the highest class in Lloyd's register of shipping. Iron vessels are classed A1 with a numeral prefixed, as 100 A1, 90 A1 (the numeral denoting that they are built respectively according to certain specifications), and they retain their character so long as on careful survey they are found in a fit and efficient condition to carry dry and perishable cargoes to and from all parts of the world. Wood and composite vessels are classed A1 for a term of years (hence such expressions as 12 A1, &c.), subject to survey. A1 in red denotes vessels that have already been classed A1 in black, but are now reduced to the second class. The letter A denotes the first-class character of the hull for build and seaworthiness; the figure 1 that the vessel is well found in rigging, gear, &c. When fittings and equipment are insufficient the 1 is omitted. There is now no A 2 class.—Æ in black marks the third class.—2. Used figuratively as an adjective, to denote excellence generally; first-class; as, an A1 speaker. [Colloq. or vulgar.]

Aam (ąm), n. [Written also Aum, Awm, the same word as D. aam, a liquid measure; G. ahm and ohm, Icel. ama, all from L.L. ama, a tub, a tierce, from L. hama, Gr. amē and hamē, a water-bucket, a pail.] A measure of liquids formerly or still to some extent in use in Holland and various countries of northern Europe, usually containing about 30 gals. more or less.

Aardvark (ärd'värk), n. [D. aarde, earth, and varken, a pig.] The ground-hog or earth-pig of South Africa. See ORYCTEROPUS.

Aardwolf (ärd'wụlf), n. [D. aarde, earth, and wolf, a wolf.] The earth-wolf of South Africa. See PROTELES.

Aaron (ā'ron), n. A corruption of Arum, sometimes used as the name of a British plant, Arum maculatum. See ARUM.

Aaronic, Aaronical (ā-ron'ik, ā-ron'ik-al), a. [Heb. aaron, perhaps, says Gesenius, the same with hāron, a mountaineer, from haram, to be high.] Pertaining to Aaron, the Jewish high-priest, or to the priesthood of which he was the head.

Aaronite (ā'ron-it), n. A descendant of Aaron, who served as a priest in the sanctuary or in the temple.

Aaron's-beard (ā'ronz-bērd), n. A popular name for Hypericum calycinum, a dwarf evergreen shrub with trailing underground stems, commonly planted on banks and rockeries.

Aaron's-rod (ā'ronz-rod), n. In arch. a rod with one serpent twined round it: sometimes confounded with caduceus, the rod of Mercury, which has two serpents.

Ab. A prefix in words of Latin origin, denoting disjunction, separation, or departure, as *ab*duct, *ab*jure. Before c and t it generally becomes abs, as *abs*cond, *abs*tain, before v and m, a, as *a*vert, *a*mentia. It is a Latin preposition, and etymologically the same as the Skr. apa, Gr. apo, G. ab, Goth. Sw. and Dan. af, E. of, off.

Ab (ab), n. [Of Syriac origin.] The eleventh month of the Jewish civil year, and the fifth of the ecclesiastical year, answering to a part of July and a part of August. In the Syriac calendar Ab is the last summer month.

Abaca (ab'a-ka), n. The Philippine name of the plant Musa textilis, which yields the Manilla-hemp from which ropes, mats, and fine fabrics are prepared.

Abaciscus (ab-a-sis'kus), n. [Dim. of abacus.] In arch. (a) the square compartment of a mosaic pavement or one of the tesseræ used in making such pavements. (b) A small square tablet or bracket used for supporting a vase or other ornamental object. (c) An abacus. [Rare.]

Abacist (ab'a-sist), n. One who uses an abacus in casting accounts; a calculator.

Aback (a-bak'), adv. [Prefix a, and back; A. Sax. onbæc, also gebæc, at, on, or towards the back. See BACK.] 1. Towards the back or rear; backward.

They drew aback, as halt with shame confound. Spenser.

2. On or at the back; behind; from behind.

His gallie . . . being set upon both before and aback. Knolles.

3. Away; aloof. [Scotch.]

O would they stay aback frae courts,
An' please themsels wi' countra sports. Burns.

4. Naut. pressed aft or against the mast by wind or otherwise: said of sails.—To brace aback, to swing (the yards) round so that the sails may be aback.

Brace the foremost yards aback. Falconer.

—Taken aback. (a) Naut. said of a vessel's sails when caught suddenly by the wind in such a way that it presses them aft against the mast. Hence, (b) Fig. suddenly or unexpectedly checked, confounded, or disappointed: said of a person; as, he was quite taken aback when I told him his plot was found out.—Laid aback (naut.), said of sails (or a vessel) when they are placed in the same position as when they are taken aback, in order to effect an immediate retreat, or to give the ship sternway, so as to avoid some danger discovered before her.

Aback† (ab'ak), n. [See ABACUS.] An abacus or something resembling one, as a flat, square stone, or a square compartment.

Abacot, Abocock (ab'a-kot, ab'o-kok), n. [As pointed out by Dr. J. A. H. Murray (Athenæum, Feb. 4, 1882), these forms as well as others, like abococked, abococket, are really spurious, being corruptions by misspelling and prefixing the article a to older bycocket, from O.Fr. bicoquet, biquoquet, dim. forms like Sp. bicoquin, bicoquete, all applied to some kind of peaked or pointed cap or hood, probably with two points, the origin of first syllable being bi, L. bis, double.

Abacot, from great seal of Henry VII.

The latter part may be from Fr. coq, a cock.] A kind of cap anciently worn by men of rank. See the following extract.

It is, I think, evident that the abocock or bycocket was the cap so frequently seen in illuminations of the fifteenth century, turned up behind, coming to a peak in front, varying and gradually decreasing in height, encircled with a crown when worn by regal personages, and similar to if not identical with what is now called the knight's chapeau. Planché.

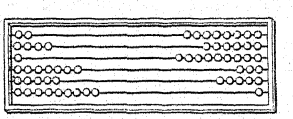
Abactor (ab-ak'tėr), n. [L., from abigo, abactum, to drive away—ab, from, away, and ago, actum, to drive.] In law, one that feloniously drives away or steals a herd or numbers of cattle at once, in distinction from one who steals a single beast or two.

Abaculus (ab-ak'ū-lus), n. [L., dim. of abacus.] A small tile of glass, marble, or other substance, of various colours, used in making patterns in mosaic pavement.

Abacus (ab'a-kus), n. [L. abacus, and abax, an abacus, a gaming-board, a sideboard, &c.; Gr. abax, a square tablet, a slab or board for reckoning on. Origin doubtful; derived by some from Phœn. abak, sand strewn on a surface for writing, because the ancients used tables covered with sand on which to make figures and diagrams; by others derived from the names of the first letters of the Greek alphabet.] 1. A tray strewn with dust or sand anciently used for calculating.



Abacus for Calculations.

2. A contrivance for calculation, used, with some variations of structure, by the Greeks and Romans, at least in later times, and still used by the Chinese, who call it shwanpan, and also in many modern schools for teaching children the elementary operations of arithmetic. It consists of an oblong frame, across which are stretched several wires, each supplied with ten balls. The balls on the under wire represent units; those on the next above it, tens; and so on to hundreds, thousands, &c. The balls at the left end of the engraved abacus represent the number 241,759; those at the right end are the spare ones. Called also Abacus Pythagoricus.

Doric Capital.
A, The Abacus.

Ionic Capital.
A, The Abacus.

3. In arch. (a) a table constituting the upper member or crowning of a column and its capital. In the Grecian Doric it has simply the form of a flat square tile without either chamfer or moulding, but generally it has a more ornamental character, and in the richer orders it parts with its original form, the four sides or faces of it being arched or cut inwards, and having at the middle of each a rose or other carved ornament. (b) Any rectangular slab or piece, as a square marble or porcelain tablet let into a wall, a compartment in a mosaic floor, or the like.—Abacus harmonicus, in anc. music, a diagram of the notes with their names.—Abacus Pythagoricus. See this word, 2.

Abaddon (ab-ad'dun), n. [Heb. abad, to be lost or destroyed.] 1. The destroyer, or angel of the bottomless pit. Rev. ix. 11.—2. The bottomless pit; the depth of hell. Milton.

Abaft (a-bäft'), adv. or prep. [Prefix a, on, at, and A. Sax. bæftan, be-æftan, after, behind —prefix be, by, and æftan, æft, E. aft, behind. See AFTER.] Naut. in or at the back or hinder part of a ship, or the parts which lie towards the stern: opposed to afore; relatively, denoting further aft, or towards the stern; as, abaft the main mast.—Abaft the beam implies that the relative situation of the object spoken of is in some part of the horizon contained between a line drawn at right angles to the keel and the point to which the ship's stern is directed. See APT.

Abaiser (a-bā'sėr), n. A name for ivory black or animal charcoal. Weale; Simmonds.

Abaissé (a-bās-sā). [Fr.] In her. a term applied to the fesse or any other bearing when it is depressed, or situated below the centre of the shield.

Abaist,† pp. [See ABASH.] Abashed; disconcerted; amazed. Chaucer.

Abalienate (ab-āl'yen-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. abalienated; ppr. abalienating. [L. abalieno, abalienatum, prep. ab, and alienus, foreign. See ALIENATE, ALIENE.] 1. To transfer the title of from one to another; to make over to another, as goods; a term of the civil law.—2.† To estrange or wholly withdraw. 'Abalienate their minds.' Abp. Sandys.

Abalienated† (ab-āl'yen-āt-ed), a. In old med.: (a) decayed or deranged, as the senses. (b) Benumbed or mortified.

Abalienation (ab-āl'yen-ā''shon), n. The act of transferring or making over the title to property to another; transfer; estrangement.

A ballata (ä bal-lat'ä). [It.] In music, in the manner of a song or ballad. Also, the chorus at the end of a verse. Wilson.

Aband† (a-band'), v.t. 1. To abandon (which see). 'The kingdom to aband.' Spenser.—2. To exile; to expel.

'Tis better far the enemies to aband
Quite from thy borders. Mir. for Mags.

Abandon (a-ban'dun), v.t. [Fr. abandonner, to forsake, to abandon, from prep. à, and O.Fr. bandon, O.E. bandown, bandoune, command, jurisdiction, from L.L. bandum, bannum, edict, proclamation, from the Teut. stem ban, seen in E. ban, banns of marriage. To abandon then is either to put to proclamation, to denounce or proscribe, or to give into the bandon or power of another. See BAN, BANNS, BANDIT, BAN-

ISH.] 1. To detach or withdraw one's self from: (a) to desert; to forsake utterly; as, to abandon his home; to abandon duty. (b) To give up and forsake, as desperate or lost; as, to abandon a hopeless enterprise or a sinking ship. (c) To resign; forego; renounce; to relinquish all concern in; as, to abandon the cares of empire. (d) To surrender; to give up to alien control; to yield up without restraint; as, he abandoned the city to the conqueror.—2.† To outlaw; to banish; to drive out or away.

Being all this time abandoned from your bed. Shak.

3.† To reject or renounce.

Blessed shall ye be when men shall hate you and abandon your name as evil.
Luke vi. 22 (Rheims N. T.).

4. In com. to relinquish to the underwriters all claim to, as ship or goods insured, as a preliminary towards recovering for a total loss.—To abandon one's self, to yield one's self up without attempt at control or self-restraint; as, to abandon one's self to grief.—Forsake, Desert, Abandon. See under FORSAKE.—SYN. To desert, forsake, resign, forego, surrender, quit, relinquish, renounce, leave.

Abandon (a-ban'dun), n. [In first meaning borrowed directly from the French in modern times.] 1. Heartiness, the result of enthusiasm, unchecked by calculation of risks or consequences; dash; the frank, unrestrained demeanour of an impulsive temperament; freedom from conventionality; as, the Inniskillings charged with characteristic abandon; I was charmed with the abandon of her manners. [In this sense the French pronunciation (ăb-ăn-dôn') is frequently retained.]—2.† The act of giving up or relinquishing; abandonment.

These heavy exactions have occasioned an abandon of all mines but what are of the richer sort.
Lord Kames.

Abandoned (a-ban'dund), p. and a. 1. Deserted; utterly forsaken; left to destruction; as, an abandoned ship. 'The most abandoned and wretched creatures.' Atterbury. 2. Given up, as to vice, especially to the indulgence of vicious appetites or passions; shamelessly and recklessly wicked; profligate.

Where our abandoned youth she sees, Shipwrecked in luxury and lost in ease. Prior.

—Profligate, Reprobate, Abandoned. Profligate is applied to one who throws away means and character in pursuit of vice, and conveys the idea of depravity manifested outwardly in conduct; reprobate is used with regard to one who has become insensible to reproof, who steels himself against what is good, and even glories in his wickedness; abandoned is applied to one who has recklessly cast himself loose from all moral restraint, and given himself up to the gratification of his vicious appetites.

Next age will see
A race more profligate than we. Roscommon.

And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind.
Rom. i. 28.

To be negligent of what any one thinks of you, does not only show you arrogant but abandoned.
T. Hughes.

SYN. Forsaken, deserted, destitute, forlorn, profligate, corrupt, vicious, depraved, reprobate, wicked, heinous, criminal, vile, odious, detestable.

Abase (a-bās'), v.t. pret. & pp. abased; ppr. abasing. [Fr. abaisser, to make low—a, to, and baisser, to lower, from L.L. bassus, low. See BASE.] 1. To lower or depress; to throw or cast down: said of material objects. [Rare.]

His spear he 'gan abase. Spenser.

And will she yet abase her eyes on me. Shak.

2. To cast down or reduce lower, as in rank, estimation, office, and the like; to depress; to humble; to degrade.—Abase, Debase, Degrade. Abase, to humble, to make of less esteem, to bring lower in state, or cause one to feel lower; debase, to lower morally or in quality, to make unworthy or less worthy of esteem, to mingle more or less of baseness with; degrade, lit. to bring down a step, to lower one's rank: often used as an official term, but also used of lowering a man morally; as, intemperance degrades its victims; a degrading employment.

Those that walk in pride he is able to abase.
Dan. iv. 37.

It is a kind of taking of God's name in vain to debase religion with such frivolous disputes.
Hooker.

O miserable man! to what fall degraded. Milton.

SYN. To depress, humble, humiliate, degrade, bring low, debase.

Abased, Abaissed (a-bāst'), p. and a. In her. turned downwards, as the points of the wings of eagles. Also, same as Abaissé.

Abasement (a-bās'ment), n. The act of abasing, humbling, or bringing low; a state of depression, degradation, or humiliation.

Abash (a-bash'), v.t. [Formerly written abaish, abaysch, &c., from O.Fr. esbahir, to astound, abash, ppr. esbahissant, from baïr, baer, to gape; Mod. Fr. s'ébahir, to be astonished; probably from bah! exclamation of astonishment. French verbs in ir, which form the ppr. in issant, take ish in becoming English, as abolish, from abolir; ravish, from ravir; polish, from polir; &c. The verb abase would no doubt have some effect on the form of this word. The D. bazen, verbazen, to astonish, if connected: with abash, would point to a different origin. Comp. abeyance, bash, bashful, bay.] To confuse or confound, as by exciting suddenly a consciousness of guilt, error, inferiority, &c.; to destroy the self-possession of; to make ashamed or dispirited; to put to confusion.—Abash, Confuse, Confound. Abash is a stronger word than confuse, but not so strong as confound. We are abashed in the presence of superiors or when detected in vice or misconduct. When we are confused the faculties get more or less beyond our control, the speech falters, and the thoughts lose their coherence. When we are confounded the reason is overpowered, a condition produced by the force of argument, testimony, or detection.

Abashed the devil stood and felt how awful goodness is. Milton.

Confused and sadly she at length replies. Pope.

Satan stood awhile as mute, confounded what to say.
Milton.

SYN. To confuse, confound, disconcert, shame, daunt, overawe.

Abashment (a-bash'ment), n. The act of abashing, or state of being abashed; confusion from shame; consternation; fear.

Which manner of abashment became her not ill.
Skelton.

That challenge did too peremptory seeme
And fild his senses with abashment great. Spenser.

She hath abated me of half my train. Shak.

7. In metal. to reduce, as a metal, to a lower temper.

Abate (a-bāt'), v.i. 1. To decrease or become less in strength or violence; as, pain abates; a storm abates.—2. To be defeated or come to naught; to fail; as, a writ abates; by the civil law a legacy to a charity does not abate by deficiency of assets.

It was still open to dispute whether it might not abate by dissolution. Hallam.

3. In law, to enter into a freehold after the death of the last occupant, and before the heir or devisee takes possession.—4. In the manege, to perform well a downward motion. A horse is said to abate, or take down his curvets, when, working upon curvets, he puts both his hind legs to the ground at once, and observes the same exactness in all the times.—SYN. To subside, decrease, intermit, decline, diminish, lessen.

Abate† (a-bāt'), n. Abatement or decrease. Sir T. Browne.

Abate (a-bā'tā), n. [It.] An abbot or abbé.

An old abate meek and mild,
My friend and teacher when a child. Longfellow.

Abatement (a-bāt'ment), n. 1. The act of abating, or the state of being abated; diminution, decrease, reduction, or mitigation; as, abatement of grief or pain.—2. The amount, quantity, or sum by which anything is abated; that by which anything is reduced; deduction; decrease.—3. In her. a mark annexed to coat armour in order to denote some dishonourable act of the party bearing the coat of arms. Nine such marks are mentioned by heralds, but no instance of their actual use is on record. The baston or baton, a mark of illegitimacy, is of the nature of an abatement.

Throwing down the stars (the nobles and senators) to the ground; putting dishonourable abatements into the fairest coats of arms. Dr. Spencer.

4. In law, (a) removal, as of a nuisance. (b) Defeat or overthrow, as of a writ. (c) The act of intruding upon a freehold vacant by the death of its former owner, and not yet taken up by the lawful heirs.—Plea of abatement, a defence by which a defendant shows cause to the court why he should not be impleaded or sued, or, if impleaded or sued, not in the manner and form adopted by the plaintiff, and prays that the action or suit may abate or cease.—SYN. Decrease, decline, mitigation, reduction, subsidence, diminution, discount, deduction.

Abater (a-bāt'ėr), n. One who or that which abates.

Abatial (ab-ā'shi-al), a. Same as Abbatical.

Abatis† (ab'a-tis), n. [L.L.—a, from, and batus, a measure.] In the middle ages, an officer of the stables who had the care of measuring out the provender; an avenor.

Abatis. See ABATTIS.

Abat-jour (a-ba-jör), n. [Fr., from abattre (see ABATE), and jour, day, light.] A skylight or sloping aperture made in the wall of an apartment for the admission of light.

Abator (a-bāt'ėr), n. One who or that which abates; specifically, in law, (a) a person who without right enters into a freehold on the death of the last possessor, before the heir or devisee. (b) An agent or cause by which an abatement is procured.

Abattis, Abatis (ab-a-tē or ab'a-tis), n. [Fr. abatis, abattis, from abattre, to beat down. See ABATE.] In fort. a collection of felled trees, from which the smaller branches have been cut off, and which are laid side by side, with the branched ends turned towards assailants, and the branches often sharpened and interlaced, the butt-ends being secured by pickets, or imbedded in the earth, the whole thus forming an obstruction to the progress of the enemy, and keeping them longer under the defenders' fire. An abattis is usually placed in front of the ditch in field fortifications. See FORTIFICATION.

Abattised (ab'a-tist), a. Provided with an abattis.

Abattoir (a-bat-wąr), n. [Fr., from abattre, to beat or knock down. See ABATE.] A public slaughter-house; especially an extensive establishment of this kind in connection with a large town.

Abature (ab'a-tūr), n. [From abate.] The mark or track of a beast of the chase on the grass; foiling.

Abat-vent (ab-ä-vän), n. [Fr., from abattre, to lower, and vent, the wind.] The sloping roof of a tower; a pent-house: so named because the slope neutralizes the force of the wind.

Abat-voix (ab-ä-vwą), n. [Fr., from abattre, to lower, and voix, the voice.] The sounding-board over a pulpit or rostrum: so named because it prevents the speaker's voice from rising and being lost or indistinct.

Abawe,† v.t. [O.Fr. esbahir, to abash. See ABASH.] To abash; to dazzle; to astonish.

> I was abawed for marvelle. Chaucer.

Abb (ab), n. [A. Sax. ab or ob, the woof.] 1. Yarn for the warp in weaving.—2. The name given in sorting wool according to its fineness to two qualities of wool, called respectively coarse abb and fine abb.

Abba (ab'ba), n. [Syr. and Chal. abba, father. The root is in the Heb. ab, a father, which appears in Abraham.] A title (equivalent to 'Father') now or formerly applied, especially in the Eastern church, to monks, superiors of monks, and other ecclesiastics. In the Syriac, Coptic, and Ethiopic Churches it is given to the bishops, who in turn bestow it, by way of distinction, on the bishop or patriarch of Alexandria.

Abbacinate (ab-ba'sin-āt), v.t. [It. abbacinare, to abbacinate—ad, to, and bacino, a basin.] To deprive of sight by applying a red-hot copper basin close to the eyes: a mode of punishment employed in the middle ages.

Abbacination (ab-ba'sin-ā''shon), n. The act or process of blinding a person by placing a red-hot copper basin close to the eyes.

Abbacy (ab'ba-si), n. [L.L. abbatia, an abbey, from L. abbas, abbatis, an abbot. See ABBOT.] The dignity, rights, and privileges of an abbot.

> According to Felinus, an abbacy is the dignity itself, since an abbot is a term or word of dignity, and not of office. Ayliffe.

Abbajeer (ab'ba-jēr), n. See ABAS. 1,

Abbandonamente (ab-ban'don-ä-ment''ä), adv. [It.] In music, with self-abandonment; so as to make the time subservient to the expression.

Abbat (ab'bat), n. Same as Abbot.

Abbatical, Abbatial (ab-bat'ik-al, ab-bā'shi-al), a. Belonging to an abbey.

Abbé (ab-bā), n. [Fr., an abbot, from Syr. and Chal. abba, father. See ABBA.] In France, an abbot; but more generally, and especially before the French revolution, a title given to all those Frenchmen who devoted themselves to divinity, or who had at least pursued a course of study in a theological seminary, in the hope that the king would confer on them a real abbey, that is, a certain part of the revenues of a monastery. The abbés were numerous. Some acted as private tutors in families, others were professors of the university, and a great many employed themselves as men of letters. The name is also applied to persons holding a similar semi-clerical position in other Roman Catholic countries. — Abbés commendataires were such abbés as held abbeys in commendam—that is, with the right of administering their revenues or a part of them. See ABBOT.

Abbess (ab'bes), n. [Fr. abbesse, L.L. abbatissa, fem. of abbot (which see).] A female superior or governess of a nunnery or convent of nuns. An abbess in the Roman Catholic Church possesses, in general, the same dignity and authority as an abbot, except that she cannot exercise the spiritual functions appertaining to the priesthood. See ABBOT.

Abbey (ab'bē), n. [Fr. abbaye, from L.L. abbatia, an abbey. See ABBÉ.] 1. A monastery or convent; a society of persons of either sex, secluded from the world, and devoted to religion and celibacy. The males are called monks, and governed by an abbot; the females are called nuns, and governed by an abbess. Abbeys differ in nothing from priories, except that the latter are governed by priors instead of abbots.—2. In Scotland, the sanctuary afforded by the abbey of Holyrood Palace, as having been a royal residence.—3. A house adjoining a monastery or convent for the residence of the superior. 4. A church attached to a monastery or convent; as, Melrose Abbey. — 5. In the early times of the French monarchy, a name given to a duchy or county, the duke or count of which was, though really a secular person, made an abbot in commendam, in consequence of an abbey having been conferred on him by the crown. See ABBOT.— 6. A mansion, formerly used as an abbey, now converted to private use; as, Newstead Abbey, the residence of Lord Byron.

Abbey-land (ab'bē-land), n. An estate in land annexed to an abbey.

Abbey-lubber (ab''bē-lub'ėr), n. [Abbey and lubber.] An old term of contempt for an idle, well-fed, lazy loiterer, who might work, but would not, preferring to depend on the charity of religious houses: frequently applied to the monks themselves in contempt. 'This is no huge, over-grown, abbey-lubber.' Dryden.

Abbot (ab'but), n. [Formerly abbat, L.L. abbas, abbatis. See ABBA.] 1. Lit. father; a title originally given to any aged monk, but afterwards limited to the head or superior of a monastery, which from him was called an abbey. As the influence of the religious orders became greater from their being the depositaries of learning, and as their wealth and territorial possessions increased, the power and dignity of the abbots were aggrandized proportionally. Many of them asserted independence of the bishops, assumed the mitre and crozier, exercised the episcopal functions in their own domains, became peers of the realm, and rivalled the prelates in rank and pomp. In the reign of Henry VIII. twenty-six mitred abbots sat in the House of Lords. Abbots are of two kinds, regular, or those who actually discharge the duties of the office, and commendatory. The latter title was formerly given to persons to whom abbeys were intrusted as tutors or trustees, or in commendam, and who applied the whole or part of the revenues to their own uses. Great secular lords frequently received this appointment. Thus Hugo Capet, the founder of the Capetian dynasty, was Abbot of St. Denis. Such abbots were by canon law bound to have received the tonsure, and to enter orders on attaining canonical age, but the obligation was easily evaded.— 2. A title formerly given to the chief magistrate of some communities or states, as in Genoa. — Abbot of Misrule, in England, Abbot of Unreason, in Scotland, the personage who took the principal part in the Christmas revels of the populace before the Reformation.

Abbotship (ab'but-ship), n. The state or office of an abbot.

Abbreviate (ab-brē'vi-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. abbreviated; ppr. abbreviating. [L. abbrevio, abbreviatum, to shorten—ab, from, and brevis, short. See BRIEF, and ABRIDGE (which is really the same word).] 1. To make briefer; to shorten; to abridge; to make shorter by contraction or omission of a part; to reduce to a smaller compass; as, to abbreviate a writing or word. — 2. In math. to reduce to the lowest terms, as fractions.

Abbreviate (ab-brē'vi-āt), v.i. To practise or use abbreviation.

> It is one thing to abbreviate by contracting, another by cutting off. Bacon.

Abbreviate (ab-brē'vi-āt), n. An abridgment.—Abbreviate of adjudication, in Scots law, an abstract of adjudication. See ADJUDICATION.

Abbreviate (ab-brē'vi-āt), a. In bot. abbreviated; applied to an organ or part of an organ shorter than a contiguous one.

Abbreviation (ab-brē'vi-ā''shon), n. 1. The act of abbreviating, shortening, or contracting, or the state of being abbreviated. 2. That which is abbreviated, as a short term or title used for a longer one; a syllable, generally the initial syllable, used for the whole word; a letter, or a series of letters, standing for a word or words; as, esq. for esquire; F.R.S. for Fellow of the Royal Society; A.D. for Anno Domini.

> This book, as graver authors say, was called Liber Domus Dei, and, by abbreviation, Domesday Book. Sir W. Temple.

3. In math. a reduction of fractions to the lowest terms.—4. In music, a sloping line or lines placed below a note or through its stem to indicate that it is to be divided into a corresponding number of short notes. Thus, a minim carrying one line is played as four quavers, or with two lines as eight semiquavers. The same line-mark, standing alone, indicates a repetition of the preceding group of notes. — Abbreviation, Contraction. An abbreviation of a word, as distinguished from contraction, is strictly a part of it, generally the first syllable, taken for the whole, with no indication of the remaining portion; as, Gen. for Genesis; math. for mathematics; Will. for William; while a contraction properly is made by the elision of certain letters or syllables from the body of the word, but in such a manner as to indicate the whole word; as, Recd. payt. for Received payment; contd. for contracted or continued; Wm. for William. In common usage, however, this distinction is not always attended to.

Abbreviator (ab-brē'vi-ā-tėr), n. [In first sense from the verb; in second from L.L. abbreviator, one of the officials mentioned under 2.] 1. One who abbreviates, abridges, or reduces to a smaller compass; specifically, one who abridges what has been written by another. 'Neither the archbishop nor his abbreviator.' Sir W. Hamilton.—2. One of a college of seventy-two persons in the chancery of the Roman Catholic pontiff, whose business is to draw up the pope's briefs, and reduce the petitions, when granted, to a suitable form for bulls.

Abbreviatory (ab-brē'vi-a-to-ri), a. Abbreviating or tending to abbreviate; shortening; contracting.

Abbreviature† (ab-brē'vi-a-tūr), n. 1. A letter or character used for shortening; an abbreviation.

> The hand of Providence writes often by abbreviatures, hieroglyphics, or short characters. Sir T. Browne.

2. An abridgment; a compendium.

Abbroach, † Abbroch† (ab-brōch'), v.i. [L.L. abrocamentum, buying wholesale and selling by retail, from same root as E. broke, broker.] To forestall the market or monopolize goods.

Abbroachment, † Abbrochment† (ab-brōch'ment), n. The act of forestalling the market or monopolizing goods. See under FORESTALL.

Abb-wool (ab'wųl), n. 1. Wool for the abb or warp of a web.—2. A variety of wool of a certain fineness. See ABB.

A, b, c. 1. The first three letters of the alphabet, used generally for the whole; as, the child is learning his A, b, c.—2. A little book for teaching the elements of reading. Called also an A, b, c book.

Abd (abd), n. [Ar., a slave, servant.] A common prefix in Arabic names of persons; as, *Abd*allah, servant of God; Abd-el-Kader, servant of the mighty God; Abd-ul-Latif, servant of the gracious God; &c.

Abdal (ab'dal), n. [Ar. Abdallah, a servant of God.] A dervish; one of a class of Persian religious devotees.

Abdalavi, Abdelavi (ab-dal-ā'vī, ab-del-ā'vī), n. The native name of the hairy cucumber of Egypt (Cucumis Chate).

Abderian (ab-dē'ri-an), a. [From Abdera, in Thrace, the birthplace of Democritus called the Laughing Philosopher, whence the application of the term.] Pertaining to Abdera or its inhabitants; resembling or recalling in some way the philosopher Democritus of Abdera; hence, a term applied to incessant or continued laughter; given to laughter.

Abderite (ab'der-īt), n. [L. abderita, Gr. abdēritēs.] An inhabitant of Abdera, a maritime town in Thrace, and sometimes a term equivalent to a stupid person, the inhabitants of this city being anciently proverbial for their stupidity.—The Abderite, Democritus of Abdera, often called the Laughing Philosopher, one of the most celebrated philosophers among the ancient Greeks.

Abdest (ab'dest), n. [Per. ābdast—āb, water, and dast, hand.] Purification or ablution before prayer: a Mohammedan rite.

Abdevenham (ab-dev'n-ham), n. In astrol. the head of the twelfth house in a scheme of the heavens.

Abdicant (ab'di-kant), n. One who abdicates.

Abdicant (ab'di-kant), a. [See ABDICATE.] Abdicating; renouncing.

> Monks abdicant of their orders. Whitlock.

Abdicate (ab'di-kāt), v.t. pret. & pp. abdicated; ppr. abdicating. [L. abdico, abdicatum, to give up a right or claim—ab, indicating separation, and dico, dicare, to declare publicly, to consecrate, to set apart, of same root as dicere, to say.] 1. To give up, renounce, abandon, lay down, or withdraw from, as a right or claim, office, duties, dignity, authority, and the like, especially in a voluntary, public, or formal manner.

> The father will disinherit or abdicate that power he hath rather than suffer it to be forced to a willing injustice. Burton.
> The cross-bearers abdicated their service. Gibbon.
> He (Charles II.) was utterly without ambition. He detested business, and would sooner have abdicated his crown than have undergone the trouble of really directing the administration. Macaulay.
> Heros and Lazarus, the Gallic bishops, were denounced . . . as vagabond, turbulent, and intriguing prelates, who had either abdicated or abandoned their sees, and travelled about sowing strife and calumny wherever they went. Milman.

2. To cast away; to take leave of; as, to abdicate one's mental faculties. [Rare or obsolete.]—3. In civil law, to disclaim and expel from a family, as a child; to disinherit during lifetime: said of a father.

> The father will disinherit or abdicate his child, quite cashier him. Burton.

4.† To put away or expel; to banish; to renounce the authority of; to dethrone; to degrade.

> Scaliger would needs turn down Homer, and abdicate him after the possession of three thousand years. Dryden.

SYN. To give up, quit, vacate, relinquish, forsake, abandon, resign, renounce, desert.

Abdicate (ab'di-kāt), v.i. To renounce or give up something; to abandon some claim; to relinquish a right, power, or trust.

> He cannot abdicate for his children, otherwise than by his own consent in form to a bill from the two houses. Swift.

Abdication (ab-di-kā'shon), n. The act of abdicating; the abandonment of an office, power or authority, right or trust; a casting off; renunciation: generally applied to giving up the kingly office.

> The consequences drawn from these facts (were) that they amounted to an abdication of the government, which abdication did not only affect the person of the king himself, but also of all his heirs, and rendered the throne absolutely and completely vacant. Blackstone.

Abdicative (ab'di-kāt-iv), a. Causing or implying abdication. Bailey. [Rare.]

Abdicator (ab'di-kāt'ėr), n. One who abdicates.

Abditive (ab'di-tiv), a. [L. abdo, abditum, to hide—ab, away, and do, to give.] Having the power or quality of hiding. [Rare.]

Abditory (ab'di-to-ri), n. [L. abditorium, from abdo. See ABDITIVE.] A place for hiding or preserving goods, plate, or money; a chest in which relics were kept.

Abdomen (ab-dō'men or ab'dō-men), n. [L., probably from abdo, to conceal, on type of acumen from acuo, and foramen from foro.] 1. That part of the human body which lies between the thorax and the pelvis. It is lined with a membrane called the peritoneum, and contains the stomach, liver, spleen, pancreas, kidneys, bladder, and intestines. It is separated from the breast internally by the diaphragm, and externally by the lower ribs. On its outer surface it is divided into certain defined portions called regions. The term is also sometimes applied to the belly of the lower animals. See Abdominal Regions under ABDOMINAL.—2. In entom. the posterior of the three parts of the perfect insect, united to the thorax by a slender connecting portion, and containing the greater portion of the digestive apparatus. It is divided into rings or segments, on the sides of which are small spiracles, or stigmata, for respiration.

Abdominal (ab-dom'in-al), a. 1. Pertaining to the abdomen or belly.—Abdominal regions, certain regions into which the abdomen in men is arbitrarily divided. An imaginary line (a a) is drawn transversely from the cartilage of the seventh rib on one side to the corresponding point of the opposite side, and another transverse line (b b) between the anterior superior spines of the ilia. The part above the upper line is called the epigastric region, that between the upper and lower lines the umbilical region, and that beneath the lower line the hypogastric region. These regions are sometimes subdivided by two vertical lines (c c), one being drawn on each side, from the cartilage of the seventh rib to the anterior superior spine of the ilium. The central portion of the epigastric region (1) retains the name of epigastric; the lateral portions (4, 4) are called the right and left hypochondriac regions; the middle part of the umbilical region (2) is still called umbilical, while the parts to the right and left (5, 5) are called lumbar; the hypogastric region is denominated pubic in its central portion (3), and is divided on each side (6, 6) into an iliac and inguinal region. The latter, however, belongs in strictness to the thigh. Posteriorly there are two regions recognized on either side of the backbone—the upper, corresponding to the hypochondriac, being called the inferior dorsal; the lower, the lumbar.—Abdominal ring, an oblong tendinous ring in both groins, through which pass the spermatic cord in men, and the round ligaments of the uterus in women. Called also Inguinal Ring.—2. In ich. having ventral fins posterior to the pectoral; as, an abdominal fish.

Abdominal Regions.

Abdominal (ab-dom'in-al), n. One of a group of malacopterygian fishes, with the ventral fins posterior to the pectorals, including many fresh-water fishes, and others which periodically leave the sea to spawn in fresh water. Many species are edible. The salmon, parr, mullet, flying-fish, herring, and carp belong to this order.

Abdominales, Abdominalia (ab-dom-i-nā'lēz, ab-dom-i-nā'li-a), n. pl. A group of malacopterygian fishes. See ABDOMINAL, n.

Abdominoscopy (ab-dom'in-os''kō-pi), n. [L. abdomen, and Gr. skopeo, to view or examine.] In med. examination of the abdomen with a view to detect disease.

Abdominous (ab-dom'in-us), a. 1. Of or pertaining to the abdomen.—2. Having a large belly; pot-bellied. [Rare.]

> Gorgonius sits abdominous and wan,
> Like a fat squab upon a Chinese fan. Cowper.

Abduce (ab-dūs'), v.t. pret. & pp. abduced; ppr. abducing. [L. abduco, to lead away—ab, and duco, to lead, to draw. See DUKE.] To draw or conduct away; to withdraw or draw to a different part.

> If we abduce the eye into either corner, the object will not duplicate. Sir T. Browne.

Abducent (ab-dūs'ent), a. [L. abducens, abducentis, ppr. of abduco, to abduce.] Drawing away; pulling back; specifically, in anat. applied to those muscles which pull back certain parts of the body from the mesial line, in contradistinction to the adducent muscles or adductors.

Abduct (ab-dukt'), v.t. 1. Same as Abduce. 2. To take away surreptitiously and by force.

> The thing is self-evident, that his majesty has been abducted or spirited away, 'enlevé,' by some person or persons unknown. Carlyle.

Abduction (ab-duk'shon), n. [L. abductio, abductionis, a leading or drawing away. See ABDUCE.] 1. The act of abducing or abducting, or state of being abduced or abducted. 2. In physiol. the action by which muscles withdraw a limb or other part from the axis of the body, as when certain muscles separate the arm from the side or the thumb from the rest of the fingers.—3. In surg. a term formerly applied to a fracture in which the bone near a joint is so divided that the extremities recede from each other.—4. In logic, a kind of syllogism, called by the Greeks apagoge, in which the major is evident, but the minor is not so clear as not to require further proof, as in this syllogism: 'All whom God absolves are free from sin: God absolves all who are in Christ; therefore all who are in Christ are free from sin.' This mode of reasoning is called abduction, because it withdraws us from the conclusion to the proof of a proposition concealed or not expressed. Fleming, Vocab. of Philos. 5. In law, the fraudulent or unlawful leading away of a person, more especially the taking and carrying away of a child, a ward, a wife, &c., either by fraud, persuasion, or open violence. The term is most commonly applied to the taking away of females. The term is also applied to the using of force to prevent a voter from voting in an election.

Abductor (ab-duk'tėr), n. One who or that which abducts; specifically, in anat. a muscle which moves certain parts from the axis of the body; as, the abductor oculi, a muscle which pulls the eye outward: opposed to adductor.

Abeam (a-bēm'), adv. [Prefix a, on, and beam.] Naut. on the beam, that is, at right angles to the keel of a ship; thus guns are said to be pointed abeam when they are pointed in a line at right angles to the ship's keel.

Abear (a-bār'), v.t. [A. Sax. aberan, to bear, to carry, to suffer, from prefix a, and beran, to carry.] 1.† To bear; to behave: with reflexive pronoun.

> Thus did the gentle knight himself abear. Spenser.

2. To suffer or tolerate. [Provincial or vulgar.]

> Gin I mun doy I mun doy, for I couldn abear to see it. Tennyson (Northern Farmer).

Abearance (a-bār'ans), n. [From abear (which see).] Behaviour; demeanour.

> The other species of recognizances with sureties is for the good abearance or good behaviour. Blackstone.

Abecedarian (ā'bē-sē-dā''ri-an), n. [A word formed from the first four letters of the alphabet.] 1. One who teaches the letters of the alphabet, or a learner of the letters. 2. A follower of Stork, an Anabaptist, in the sixteenth century, so called because he rejected all worldly knowledge, even the learning of the alphabet.

Abecedarian, Abecedary (ā'bē-sē-dā''ri-an, ā-bē-sē'dā-ri), a. Pertaining to or formed by the letters of the alphabet.—Abecedarian psalms, hymns, &c., psalms, hymns, &c., in which (as in the 119th psalm), distinct portions have the verses begin with successive letters of the alphabet.

Abeche,† v.t. [O. Fr. abécher; Fr. abéquer, abecquer, to feed with the beak, to feed an infant—a, and bec, the beak.] To feed, as a parent bird feeds its young.

> Yet should I somedel ben abechted,
> And for the time well refreshed. Gower.

Abed (a-bed'), adv. [Prefix a, on, and bed.] 1. On or in bed.

> Not to be abed after midnight is to be up betimes. Shak.

2. To bed.

> Her mother dream'd before she was deliver'd
> That she was brought abed of a buzzard. Beau. & Fl.

Abee, A-be (a-bē'). [Scotch. Comp. A do.] Used in phrase to let abee or a-be, to let alone; to let be.—Let abee is also used as a noun in the sense of forbearance.—Let abee for let abee, one act of forbearance meeting another; mutual forbearance.

> I am for let-a-be for let-a-be. Sir W. Scott.

—Let abee (adv.), far less; not to mention; as, he couldna sit let abee stand.

Abegge,† v.t. [See ABY.] To suffer for, or atone for; to aby.

> There dorste no wight hond upon him legge,
> That he ne swore he shuld anon abegge. Chaucer.

Abeigh (a-bēch'), adv. [O. Fr. abbay, abbois, Fr. abois, the bark of a dog; tenir en abbay, to hold at bay, from baer, baïr, to gape. See ABASH, BAY.] [Scotch.] Aloof; at a shy distance.—To stand abeigh, to keep aloof.

> Maggie coost her head fu' high,
> Look'd askient and unco skeigh,
> Gart poor Duncan stand abeigh—
> Ha, ha, the wooing o't. Burns.

Abele, Abel-tree (a-bēl', ā'bel-trē), n. [G. albele, alber; M.H.G. alber; O.H.G. albari; D. abeel; Fr. aubel, aubrelle, perhaps from L. albellus, whitish, or from L. arbor, It. albero, a tree.] The white poplar (Populus alba), so called from the white colour of its twigs and leaves. See POPLAR.

Abelian (ā-bel'yan), a. Of or pertaining to the mathematician Abel.—Abelian equation, an irreducible algebraic equation, one of whose roots is inexpressible as a rational function of a second, and shown by Abel to be solvable by the solution of a second equation of a lower degree.—Abelian functions, inverse Abelian integrals, analogous to functions of the amplitude of an ordinary elliptic integral, and also to inverse circular and logarithmic functions; as, sin. $-ix$, log. $-ix$. —Abelian integrals, a class of ultra-elliptic integrals first investigated by Abel.

Abelian (ā-bel'yan), n. A member of a sect in Africa which arose in the fourth century. They married, but lived in continence, after the manner, as they maintained, of Abel, and attempted to keep up the sect by adopting the children of others. Also called Abelonian and Abelite.

Abelmoschus, Abelmosk (ā-bel-mos'kus, ā'bel-mosk), n. [Ar. habb-el-mosk, seed of musk, or abu-el-mosk, father of musk, that is, endued with musk.] A genus of plants nat. order Malvaceæ. A. moschatus, or Hibiscus abelmoschus, is an evergreen shrub of tropical Asia and America, 3 feet high. The seeds have a musky odour, for which reason the Arabs mix them with coffee. A. esculentus is an Indian annual, 4 feet high, variously called ochro, bandikai, gombo, &c. It yields a much esteemed mucilaginous fruit, used in soups and pickles in the W. Indies, Isle of France, &c. All the species yield good fibre.

Abel-tree. See ABELE.

A bene placito (ä bā'nā plach'ē-tō). [It.] In music, at pleasure; indicating that a piece is to be played in the way the performer likes best.

Aber (a'bėr), n. [Cym. and Pictish equivalent of Gael. inver. There are three Welsh forms to denote meeting of waters—aber, ynver, cynver, compounded of cyn=L. con, together, and ber, flowing, seen in berad, a running of water; Armor. beri, to flow. Cwmry, Cymry, Cumberland, Cumbraes, Humber, exhibit the word under various forms. See CYMRY, INVER.] A Celtic word prefixed to the names of many places in Great Britain, and signifying a confluence of waters, either of two rivers, or of a river with the sea; as, *Aber*deen, *Aber*dour, *Aber*gavenny, *Aber*ystwith.

Aberdevine (a-bėr'dē-vīn), n. The Fringilla spinus or siskin, a well-known song-bird, belonging to the finch family (Fringillidæ), somewhat resembling the green variety of the canary bird. It is a native of Scandinavia, visiting Britain in autumn and winter.

Aberr (ab-er'), v.i. To wander; to err. Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Aberrance, Aberrancy (ab-er'rans, ab-er'ran-si), n. [L. aberro, to wander from—ab, and erro, to wander.] A wandering or deviating from the right way; a deviation from truth or rectitude. Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Aberrant (ab-er'rant), a. [L. aberrans, pp. of aberro, to wander.] 1. Wandering, straying from the right way.—2. In zool. and bot. applied to certain animals and plants which differ materially from the type of their natural group.

> The more aberrant any form is, the greater must have been the number of connecting forms, which on my theory have been exterminated or utterly lost. Darwin.

Aberrate (ab-er'rāt), v.i. [L. aberro, aberratum (ab and erro), to wander from.] To wander or deviate from the right way. [Rare.]

> The product of their defective and aberrating vision. De Quincey.

Aberration (ab-er-rā'shon), n. [L. aberratio, from aberro, aberratum—ab, from, erro, to wander.] 1. The act of wandering from; especially, in a figurative sense, the act of wandering from the right way; deviation from truth or moral rectitude; deviation from a type or standard.

> So then we draw near to God, when, repenting us of our former aberrations from him, we renew our covenants with him. Bp. Hall.

2. In astron. the difference between the true and the observed position of a heavenly body, the result of the combined effect of the motion of light and the motion of the eye of the observer caused by the annual or diurnal motion of the earth, or of the motion of light and that of the body from which the light proceeds: when the auxiliary cause is the annual revolution of the earth round the sun, it is called annual aberration, in consequence of which a fixed star may appear as much as 20″·4 from its true position; when the auxiliary cause is the diurnal rotation of the earth on its axis, it is called diurnal aberration, which amounts at the greatest to 0″·3; and when the auxiliary cause is the motion of the body from which the light proceeds, it is called planetary aberration.—3. In optics, a deviation in the rays of light when unequally refracted by a lens, or reflected by a mirror, so that they do not converge and meet in a point or focus, but spread out, forming an indistinct and coloured image of the object. It is called spherical when the imperfection arises from the form of curvature of the lens or reflector, and chromatic when it arises from the different refrangibility of the rays composing white light, the image of the object being surrounded with prismatic colours. In the former case it produces distortion, and in the latter false colour of the object. In the eye the iris and crystalline lens prevent these aberrations. Optical instruments corrected for chromatic aberration are called achromatic.—4. In physiol. the passage of a fluid in the living body into vessels not destined to receive it, as also the determination of a fluid to an organ different from that to which it is ordinarily directed, as in vicarious hemorrhage.—5. In zool. and bot. deviation of a plant or animal from the type of its natural group.

> In whichever light, therefore, insect aberration is viewed by us . . . we affirm that it does . . . exist. T. V. Wollaston.

6. Partial alienation of mind; mental wandering.—Circle of aberration, the circle of coloured light observed in experiments with convex lenses between the point where the violet rays and that where the red rays meet.—Crown of aberration, a luminous circle surrounding the disc of the sun depending on the aberration of its rays, by which its apparent diameter is enlarged.

Aberuncate† (ab-ē-rung'kāt), v.t. [Prefix ab, and L. eruncо, to weed out—e, out, and runco, to weed.] To pull up by the roots; to extirpate utterly. Bailey.

Aberuncator (ab-er-rung'kāt-ėr), n. An implement for extirpating weeds; a weeder or weeding-machine; an averruncator.

Abet (a-bet'), v.t. pret. & pp. abetted; ppr. abetting. [O.Fr. abetter, abeter, to incite, to lure, to deceive, to befool; O.Fr. abet, deceit; Norm. abet, a bait—prefix a, and root of bait, to incite, set on. See BAIT.] 1. To encourage by aid, countenance, or approval: used chiefly in a bad sense, and always with a personal object.

> They abetted both parties in the civil war, and always furnished supplies to the weaker side, lest there should be an end put to these fatal divisions. Addison.

2.† To maintain; to support; to uphold: in this sense sometimes with a thing for the object.

> Then shall I soon, quoth he, . . .
> Abet that virgin's cause disconsolate. Spenser.

3. In law, to encourage, counsel, incite, or assist in a criminal act. In Scots law, a person is said to be abetting though he may only protect a criminal, conceal him from justice, or aid him in making his escape. Hence—4. To lead to or encourage the commission of.

> Would not the fool abet the stealth
> Who rashly thus exposed his wealth? Gay.

SYN. To aid, assist, support, encourage, sustain, back, connive at.

Abet† (a-bet'), n. The act of aiding or encouraging, especially in a crime. Chaucer.

Abetment (a-bet'ment), n. The act of abetting.

Abettal (a-bet'al), n. Act of abetting; aid. Bailey. [Rare.]

Abetter, Abettor (a-bet'ėr), n. 1. One who abets or incites; one who aids or encourages another to commit a crime; a supporter or encourager of something bad.

> But let th' abetters of the panther's crime
> Learn to make fairer wars another time. Dryden.

[In law, an abettor, as distinguished from an accessory, is more especially one who being present gives aid or encouragement.]

2. One who aids or encourages: in a good sense. Pope.

Abevacuation (ab-ē-vak'ū-ā''shon), n. [L. ab and E. evacuation.] In med. (a) a partial evacuation. (b) An immoderate evacuation.

Ab extra (ab eks'tra). [L.] From without.

Abeyance (a-bā'ans), n. [Norm. Fr. abbaiaunce, abbaizance, expectation, from abbayer, to listen with the mouth open, from bayer, baer, baïr, to gape, as in crying bah! See ABASH.] 1. In law, a state of expectation or contemplation; thus, the fee simple or inheritance of lands and tenements is in abeyance when there is no person in being in whom it can vest, so that it is in a state of expectancy or waiting until a proper person shall appear. If, for instance, land is leased to a man for life, remainder to another for years, the remainder for years is in abeyance till the death of the lessee for life. Titles of honour and dignities are said to be in abeyance when it is uncertain who shall enjoy them, as when a nobleman holding his dignity descendible to his heirs general dies leaving daughters, the king by his prerogative may grant the dignity to which of the daughters he pleases, or on the male issue of one of such daughters. During the time the title to the dignity is thus in suspension it is said to be in abeyance.—2. A state of suspension or temporary want of exercise.

> There is such a thing as keeping the sympathies of love and admiration in a dormant state, or state of abeyance. De Quincey.

Abeyant (a-bā'ant), a. In law, being in abeyance.

Abgregate† (ab'grē-gāt), v.t. [L. abgrego, to lead away from the flock—ab, away, and grex, gregis, a flock.] To separate from a herd.

Abhal (ab'hal), n. A name given in the East Indies to the berries of a species of cypress or juniper which are believed to be a powerful emmenagogue. Written sometimes Abhel.

Abhominable (ab-hom'in-a-bl), a. An old mode of spelling abominable (from its being supposed to be derived from ab homine, from or repugnant to man), ridiculed as pedantic by Shakspere in the character of the pedant Holofernes.

> This is abhominable which he would call abominable. Love's Labour Lost.

Abhor (ab-hor'), v.t. pret. & pp. abhorred; ppr. abhorring. [L. abhorreo, to shrink back—ab, from, and horreo, to shudder, to feel horror.] 1. To hate extremely or with loathing; to loathe, detest, or abominate; to feel excessive repugnance towards; to shrink from with horror.

> Therefore I say again,
> I utterly abhor, yea, from my soul,
> Refuse you for my judge. Shak.
> Thou didst not abhor the virgin's womb. Te Deum.

2. To fill with horror and loathing. [Rare.]

> It doth abhor me now I speak the word. Shak.

—Hate, Abhor, Detest. See under HATE.

Abhor† (ab-hor'), v.i. 1. To shrink back with disgust, or fear, and shuddering. 'To abhorre from those vices.' Udall.—2. To be inconsistent with, opposite or contrary to: followed by from.

> Which is utterly abhorring from the end of all law. Milton.

Abhorred (ab-hord'), p. and a. Hated extremely; detested; as, no one is more abhorred.

Abhorrence (ab-hor'rens), n. Extreme hatred; detestation; great aversion.

> A sensitive abhorrence of proselytism. Sir G. C. Lewis.

Abhorrency† (ab-hor'ren-si), n. Abhorrence.

> The first tendency to any injustice . . . must be suppressed with a show of wonder and abhorrency in the parents. Locke.

Abhorrent (ab-hor'rent), a. 1. Hating; detesting; struck with abhorrence.

> The arts of pleasure in despotic courts
> I spurn abhorrent. Glover.

2. Contrary; utterly repugnant; violently inconsistent with: formerly with from, now with to.

> This legal, and as it should seem injudicious profanation, so abhorrent to our stricter principles, was received with a very faint murmur. Gibbon.

Abhorrently (ab-hor'rent-li), adv. With abhorrence.

Abhorrer (ab-hor'ėr), n. One who abhors; specifically, in the reign of Charles II., a member of the court party, afterwards called Tories. They derived their name from their professed abhorrence of the principles of the Addressers, who endeavoured to encroach on the royal prerogative. See ADDRESSER.

Great numbers of abhorrers, from all parts of England, were seized by order of the Commons, and committed to custody. Hume.

Abhorrible (ab-hor'ri-bl), a. Worthy or deserving to be abhorred. [Rare.]

They shall be an abhorring to all flesh. Is. lxvi. 44.

Abib (ā'bib), n. [Heb. abîb, an ear of corn, from abab, to produce the first or early fruit—root ab, a swelling.] The first month of the Jewish ecclesiastical year, called also Nisan. It begins at the spring equinox, and answers to the latter part of March and beginning of April. Its name is derived from the full growth of wheat in Egypt, which took place anciently, as it does now, at that season.

Abidance (a-bīd'ans), n. The act of abiding; abode; stay. Fuller. [Rare.]

Abide (a-bīd'), v.i. pret. & pp. abode; ppr. abiding. [A. Sax. abidan, gebidan, to abide, from bidan, to bide. See BIDE.] 1. To take up one's abode; to dwell; to reside; to stay for a shorter or longer time.—2. To remain; not to depart.

Except these abide in the ship, ye cannot be saved. Acts xxvii. 31.

3. To continue in a certain condition; to remain steadfast or faithful. 1 Cor. vii. 40. 4. To inhere; to belong, as an attribute or quality; to have its seat.

Less spirit to curse abides in me. Shak.

—Abide by, (a) to remain at rest beside. 'Abide by thy crib.' Job xxxix. 9. (b) To adhere to; to maintain; to defend; to stand to; as, to abide by a friend; specifically, in Scots law, to adhere to as true and genuine: said of the party who founds on a deed or writing which the other party desires to have reduced or declared null and void, on the ground of forgery or falsehood. (c) To await or accept the consequences of; to rest satisfied with; as, to abide by the event or issue.

Abide (a-bīd'), v.t. 1.† To wait for; especially, to stand one's ground against.

Abide me if thou darest. Shak.

2. To be prepared for; to await; to be in store for.

Bonds and afflictions abide me. Acts ix. 23.

To abide the indignation of the Lord. Joel ii. 11.

4. To put up with; to tolerate. [Colloq.]

I cannot abide the smell of hot meat. Shak.

5. [This meaning attaches to the word from a kind of confusion with aby, abie. See ABY.] To pay the price or penalty for; to suffer for.

If it be found so, some will dear abide it. Shak.

Ah me! they little know
How dearly I abide that boast so vain. Milton.

Abider (a-bīd'ėr), n. One who dwells or continues.

Abiding (a-bīd'ing), a. Continuing; permanent; steadfast; as, an abiding faith.

Abidingly (a-bīd'ing-li), adv. In such a manner as to continue; permanently.

Abies (ab'i-es), n. [L.] The fir, a genus of trees of the sub-order Abietinæ, nat. order Coniferæ, well known for the valuable timber that is produced by many of the species. It differs from the genus Pinus in the leaves growing singly on the stem, and the scales of the cones being smooth, round, and thin. To this genus belong the silver fir (A. picea), the great Californian fir (A. grandis), the balm of Gilead fir (A. balsamifera), the large-bracted fir (A. nobilis), the hemlock spruce fir (A. canadensis), sacred Mexican fir (A. religiosa), Norway spruce fir (A. excelsa), Oriental fir (A. orientalis), white spruce fir (A. alba), Douglas' fir (A. Douglasii), &c. See FIR, PINE.

Abietic (ab-i-et'ik), a. Of or pertaining to trees of the genus Abies.—Abietic acid ($C_{20}H_{30}O$), an acid discovered in the resin of trees of the genus Abies.

Abietinæ (ab'i-et-ī''nē), n. pl. [L. abies, the fir.] The firs and spruces, a sub-order of plants, nat. order Coniferæ, having the fertile flowers in cones, with one or two inverted ovules at the base of each scale. It includes many valuable timber-trees, often rising 130 to 180 feet high, arranged under the genera Pinus, Abies, Picea, Larix, Cedrus, Araucaria, Dammara, &c.

Abietite (ab'i-et-īt), n. ($C_6H_2O_3$.) A sugar obtained from the needles of Abies pectinata.

Abiogenesis (a-bī'ō-jen''ē-sis), n. [Gr. a, priv., bios, life, and genesis, generation, production. See BIOGENESIS.] In biol. the doctrine that living matter may be produced by not living matter. In the seventeenth century this was the dominant view, sanctioned alike by antiquity and authority, and was first assailed by Redi, an Italian philosopher. Needham and Buffon, who have been regarded as the supporters of this hypothesis, held the doctrine in a very modified degree. They held that life is the indefeasible property of certain indestructible molecules of matter which exist in all living things, and have inherent activities by which they are distinguished from not living matter; each individual living organism being formed by their temporary combination, and they standing to it in the relation of the particles of water to a cascade or a whirlpool, or to a mould, into which the water is poured. See BIOGENESIS, HETEROGENESIS.

Abirritation (ab-ir'rit-ā''shon), n. [L. ab, as a dim., and irritatio, irritation.] In med. a diminished condition of the vital phenomena of the tissues, inclining to debility or asthenia.

The young Cambridge democrats were all ablaze to assist Torrijos. Carlyle.

-Able, -Ible, -Ble. A very common termination of English adjectives, especially those based on verbs, representing the L. -abilis, -ibilis, a termination equivalent to the adjective habilis, fit, suitable. To the bases to which it is attached it generally adds the notion of capable of, worthy of, and sometimes full of, causing; as, obtainable, capable of being obtained; tolerable, capable of being borne; laudable, worthy of praise; credible, that may be believed, or worthy of belief; forcible, full of force; horrible, terrible, full of or causing horror, terror. Many of these adjectives, such as tolerable, credible, legible, have been borrowed directly from the Latin or the French, and are in a somewhat different position from those formed by adding the termination to an already existing English word, as in the case of obtainable. Adjectives of this kind, with a passive signification, are the most numerous, and the base may be Anglo-Saxon or Latin; eatable, bearable, readable, believable, &c., are of the former kind. Of those in -able with an active signification we may mention delectable, suitable, capable. Of a neuter signification are durable, equable, conformable. All these are from verbal bases, but there are others derived from nouns, such as actionable, objectionable, peaceable, saleable, serviceable. As to when -able and when -ible is to be used, Mr. Fitzedward Hall remarks, 'Generally, the termination is -ible, if the base is the essentially uncorrupted stem of a Latin infinitive or supine of any conjugation but the first. . . . To the rule given above, however, there are many objections. . . . To all verbs, then, from the Anglo-Saxon, or all based on the uncorrupted, infinitival stems of Latin verbs of the first conjugation, and to all substantives, whencesoever sprung, we annex -able only.' See his work On English Adjectives in -Able, with Special Reference to Reliable.

Able (ā'bl), a. [O.E. abil, abul, habil, O.Fr. able, hable, Norm. hable, Fr. habile, skilful, fit, from L. habilis, suitable, fit, hardy, from habeo, to have, hold; from same base are ability, habiliment, &c., and suffix -able (which see).] 1. Having the power or means sufficient; as, a man able to perform military service; a child is not able to reason on abstract subjects.

Abroachment† (a-brōch'ment), n. Same as Abbroachment.

Abroad (a-brąd'), adv. [A. Sax. onbrædе, that is, on breadth, from on, and brād, broad. See BROAD.] At large; widely; without being confined to narrow limits; with expansion; as, a tree spreads its branches abroad.

> The angry northern wind
> Will blow these sands, like Sibyl's leaves, abroad.
> Shak.

Specifically, (a) beyond or out of the walls of a house, camp, or other inclosure; as, to walk abroad. (b) Beyond the bounds of a country; in foreign countries; as, to go abroad for an education; we have broils at home and enemies abroad. (c) Extensively; before the public at large.

> He . . . began . . . to blaze abroad the matter.
> Mark i. 45.

—To be all abroad, (a) to be wide of the mark, in a figurative sense; to be far wrong in one's guess or estimate. (b) To be at a loss; to be puzzled, perplexed, bewildered, non-plussed; to be all or quite at sea.—The schoolmaster is abroad, education is diffused among the people. See under SCHOOLMASTER.

Abrocoma (ab-ro'ko-ma), n. [Gr. habros, delicate, and komē, hair.] A genus of small rodent, rat-like animals, natives of South America, remarkable for the fineness of their fur. More properly Habrocoma.

Abrogable (ab'rō-ga-bl), a. Capable of being abrogated.

Abrogate (ab'rō-gāt), v.t. pret. & pp. abrogated; ppr. abrogating. [L. abrogo, to repeal—ab, from, and rogo, to ask or propose, as a law.] 1. To repeal; to annul by an authoritative act; to abolish by the authority of the maker or his successor: applied to the repeal of laws, decrees, ordinances, the abolition of established customs, &c.—2. To keep clear of; to avoid: so used by a pedant in Love's Labour's Lost.

> Perge, good Holofernes, perge; so it shall please you to abrogate scurrility. Shak.

—Abolish, Repeal, Abrogate. See under ABOLISH.—SYN. To repeal, annul, set aside, rescind, revoke, abolish, cancel.

Abrogate† (ab'rō-gāt), a. Annulled; abolished.

Abrogation (ab-rō-gā'shon), n. The act of abrogating; repeal by authority of the legislative power, or any competent authority.

Abroma (ab-rō'ma), n. [Gr. a, neg., and brōma, food.] A genus of plants, nat. order Sterculiaceæ, tribe Buttnerieæ. A. augusta is a native of the East Indies, and A. fastuosa of New South Wales. Some of the species are evergreen stove shrubs.

Abrood† (a-brōd'), adv. [Prefix a, on, and brood.] In the act, or as in the act of brooding.

> The Spirit of God sat abrood upon the whole rude mass. Abp. Sancroft.

Abrooding† (a-brōd'ing), n. The act of brooding over.

Abrook† (a-brųk'), v.t. To brook; to endure. See BROOK.

> Ill can thy noble mind abrook
> The abject people gazing in thy face. Shak.

Abrotanoid (a-brot'an-oid), n. [Gr. abrotonon, a plant, southernwood, and eidos, form.] A species of sclerodermatous corals, the Madrepora abrotanoida, an East Indian reef coral.

Abrotanum (a-brot'an-um), n. [Gr. abrotonon; L. abrotonum; L.L. abrotanum.] An evergreen plant, of the genus Artemisia, called also southernwood. See SOUTHERNWOOD.

Abrupt (ab-rupt'), a. [L. abruptus, from abrumpo, to break off—ab, off, from, and rumpo, ruptum, to break. See RUPTURE.] 1. Steep; craggy: applied to rocks, precipices, and the like.—2. Fig. sudden; without notice to prepare the mind for the event; as, an abrupt entrance or dress.

> Abrupt death,
> A period puts and stops his impious breath.
> Shak.

3. Unconnected; having sudden transitions from one subject to another; as, an abrupt style.—4. In bot. suddenly terminating.—Abrupt leaf, one that has its extremity cut off as it were by a transverse line.—Abrupt-pinnate leaf, a leaf which has neither leaflet nor tendril at the end.

1, Abrupt Root. 2, Abrupt Leaf. 3, Abrupt-pinnate.

—Abrupt root, one terminating abruptly, as if part had been cut off.—SYN. Sudden, unexpected, hasty, rough, blunt, disconnected, broken.

Abrupt (ab-rupt'), n. An abrupt place; a vast chasm. [Rare and poetical.]

> Or spread his aery flight,
> Upborne with undefatigable wings
> Over the vast abrupt. Milton.

Abrupt† (ab-rupt'), v.t. To break off; to interrupt; to disturb. 'Insecurity . . . abrupteth our tranquillities.' Sir T. Browne.

Abrupted (ab-rupt'ed), a. Torn off; torn asunder.

Abruption (ab-rup'shon), n. [See ABRUPT.] A sudden breaking off; a sudden termination; a violent separation of bodies.

By this abruption posterity lost more instruction than delight. Johnson.

Abruptly (ab-rupt'li), adv. 1. Precipitously; as, the rocks rise abruptly from the water's edge.—2. Suddenly, without giving notice, or without the usual forms; as, the minister left France abruptly.—3. In bot. with an abrupt termination; as, an abruptly pinnate leaf. See under ABRUPT.

Abruptness (ab-rupt'nes), n. 1. The state or quality of being abrupt; as, (a) the state or quality of being steep or craggy; precipitousness. (b) Suddenness; unceremonious haste or vehemence.—2. Harshness or roughness in sound.

Some other languages, for their soft and melting fluency, as having no abruptness of consonants, have some advantage of the English. Howell.

Abrus (ab'rus), n. [Gr. habros, elegant.] A genus of leguminous plants. A. precatorius, or wild liquorice, is a West Indian evergreen climber. Its polished and parti-coloured seeds, called jumble beads, were formerly strung and employed as beads for rosaries, necklaces, &c. Its root is used in the West Indies as liquorice is with us.

Abscess (ab'ses), n. [L. abscessus, a going away, and in medical language an abscess, from abscedere, to depart, to separate, to gather into an abscess—abs, away, and cedo, cessum, to go, whence cession, cede, &c.] In med. a collection of purulent matter, formed or deposited in the structure of an organ or part; an imposthume. An abscess is never an original disease, but the effect of inflammatory action however excited.

Abscession† (ab-se'shon), n. [See ABSCESS.] An abscess.

Abscind (ab-sind'), v.t. [L. abscindo, to cut off—ab, from, and scindo, to cut.] To cut off. [Rare.] 'Two syllables abscinded from the rest.' Johnson.

Absciss (ab'sis), n. Same as Abscissa.

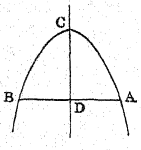
Abscissa (ab-sis'sa), n. pl. Abscissæ (ab-sis'sē). [L. abscissus, pp. of abscindo, to cut off. See ABSCIND.] Any part of the diameter or transverse axis of a conic section, intercepted between the vertex, or some other fixed point where all the abscissæ begin, and another line called the ordinate which is terminated in the curve. Thus, in the parabolic figure B C A, the part of the axis D C intercepted between the semi-ordinate B D and the vertex C is an abscissa.



Abscissio infiniti (ab-sis'si-ō in-fē-nī'tē). [L.] A logical series of arguments in which we go on excluding, one by one, certain suppositions from the object whose real nature we are seeking to ascertain. Thus, we may say of a disease it cannot be small-pox, for, &c.; it cannot be scarlatina, for, &c.; and so go on gradually narrowing the range of possible suppositions.

Abscission (ab-si'zhon), n. [L. abscissio, from abscindo, abscissum, to cut off.] 1. The act of cutting off; severance; removal. 'Not to be cured without the abscission of a member.' Jer. Taylor.—2.† The act of putting an end to; the act of annulling or abolishing. Jer. Taylor; Sir T. Browne.—3. Retrenchment. [Rare.]—4.† The sudden termination of a disease by death. Hooper.—5. In rhet. a figure of speech, when, having begun to say a thing, a speaker stops abruptly, as supposing the matter sufficiently understood. Thus, 'He is a man of so much honour and candour, and such generosity—but I need say no more.'

Abscond (ab-skond'), v.i. [L. abscondo, to hide—abs, from, and condo, to hide.] 1. To retire from public view, or from the place in which one resides or is ordinarily to be found; to withdraw or absent one's self in a private manner; to take one's self off; to decamp; especially used of persons who go out of the way in order to avoid a legal process.—2. To hide, withdraw, or lie concealed. 'The marmot which absconds all winter.' Ray.

Abscond† (ab-skond'), v.t. To conceal.

Nothing discoverable in the lunar surface is ever covered and absconded from us by the interposition of any clouds or mists but such as rise from our own globe. Bentley.

Abscondedly† (ab-skond'ed-li), adv. In concealment or hiding.

An old Roman priest that then lived abscondedly in Oxon. Wood.

Abscondence† (ab-skond'ens), n. Concealment.

Absconder (ab-skond'ėr), n. One who absconds.

Absconsio (ab-skon'shi-o), n. [See ABSCOND.] In anat. and surg. a cavity or sinus.

Absence (ab'sens), n. [L. absentia, absence, from absens, absentis, absent, pres. part. of absum, to be absent—ab or abs, away, and sum, esse, to be. From same base are present, entity, &c.] The state of being absent: (a) the state of being at a distance in place; state of being away: opposed to presence; as, speak no ill of one in his absence. (b) The state of being awanting; non-existence within a certain sphere; as, the absence of evidence. 'In the absence of conventional law.' Ch. Kent. (c) Inattention to things present; an example or instance of inattention. 'To conquer that abstraction which is called absence.' Landor. 'Reflecting on the little absences and distractions of mankind.' Addison.—Absence of mind, the result of the mind fixing its attention on a subject which does not occupy the rest of the company, and which draws it away from things or objects present, to others distant or foreign.—Decree in absence, in Scots law, a decree pronounced against a defender who has not appeared and pleaded on the merits of the cause.

Absent (ab'sent), a. 1. Not present; not in a certain place or among certain people; at a distance; away; somewhere else. 'Absent from one another.' Gen. xxxi. 49.—2. Not existing somewhere; being awanting; not forming an attribute of something; as, among them refinement is absent; revenge is entirely absent from his character.—3. Inattentive to persons present, or to subjects of conversation or surrounding objects; having the mind withdrawn from what is passing; heedless; as, an absent man is uncivil to the company.

What is commonly called an absent man, is commonly either a very weak or a very affected man. Chesterfield.

—Absent, Abstracted. An absent man is one whose mind is so constituted that it unconsciously wanders from the scene or circumstances in which he is; but a man is abstracted from what is present by some overmastering emotion, or some weighty matter for reflection concentrating his attention on itself.

Absent (ab-sent'), v.t. 1. To withdraw to such a distance as to prevent intercourse; to keep away: used with reflexive pronouns; as, let a man absent himself from the company. 'If I should yet absent me from your bed.' Shak.—2.† To make absent.

Go: for thy stay, not free, absents thee more. Milton.

Absent† (ab'sent), n. One who is not present.

Let us enjoy the right of Christian absents, to pray for one another. Bp. Morton.

Absentaneous† (ab'sen-tā"nē-us), a. Relating to absence; absent. Bailey.

Absentation (ab-sen-tā'shon), n. The act of absenting one's self; absence.

His absentation at that juncture becomes significant. Sir W. Hamilton.

Absentee (ab-sen-tē'), n. [See ABSENCE.] One who is absent; more narrowly, one who withdraws from his country, office, estate, post, duty, or the like; one who removes to a distant place or to another country: it is a term specifically applied generally by way of reproach to landlords and capitalists, who, deriving their income from one country, reside in another, in which they spend their incomes.—Absentee tax, a tax of 4*s.* in the pound, imposed in Ireland in 1715 on the incomes and pensions of absentees. It ceased in 1753. Unsuccessful attempts were made in 1773 and 1783 to reimpose it.

Absenteeism (ab-sen-tē'izm), n. The practice or habit which gives the name of an absentee; the practice of absenting one's self from one's country, station, or estate.

Absenter (ab-sent'ėr), n. One who absents himself.

He (Judge Foster) has fined all the absenters £20 apiece. Ld. Thurlow.

Absently (ab'sent-li), adv. In an absent or inattentive manner; with absence of mind.

Absentment (ab-sent'ment), n. The state of being absent. Barrow. [Rare.]

Absinth (ab'sinth), n. Wormwood. See ABSINTHIUM.

Absinthe (ab-saṅt, ap-saṅt), n. [Fr.] A popular French liqueur or cordial consisting of brandy flavoured with wormwood.

Absinthian (ab-sin'thi-an), a. [See ABSINTHIUM.] Of the nature of wormwood. 'Tempering absinthian bitterness with sweets.' Randolph.

Absinthiate (ab-sin'thi-āt), v.t. To impregnate with wormwood.

Absinthin, Absinthine (ab-sin'thin), n. ($C_{16}H_{22}O_5$.) The crystalline bitter principle of wormwood (Artemisia Absinthium).

Absinthium (ab-sin'thi-um), n. [L. absinthium, Gr. absinthion, Per. and Chal. afsinthin.] The common wormwood (Artemisia Absinthium), a bitter plant, used as a tonic. It belongs to the nat. order Compositæ.

Absis (ab'sis). In astron. see APSIS.

Absist† (ab-sist'), v.i. [L. absisto, to withdraw.] To stand off; to leave off.

Absistence† (ab-sis'tens), n. A standing off; a refraining or holding back from.

Absit omen (ab'sit ō'men). [L.] May it not be ominous! May the omen be falsified!

Absolute (ab'sō-lūt), a. [L. absolutus. See ABSOLVE.] 1. Freed from limitation or condition; unconditional; as, an absolute promise; an absolute bond.—2. Unlimited by extraneous power or control; as, an absolute government or prince.—3. Complete in itself; finished; perfect; consummate; as, absolute beauty: now applied in this sense only to qualities, but formerly applied also to persons. 'As grave, as just, as absolute as Angelo.' Shak.

So absolute she seems
And in herself complete. Milton.

4. Positive; decided; certain; not in doubt: frequent in Shakspere, but now rare.

The colour of my hair he cannot tell,
Or answers dark, at random: while, be sure,
He's absolute on the figure, five or ten,
Of my last subscription. Mrs. Browning.

5. Peremptory; authoritative. 'Tapped her on the head with absolute forefinger.' Mrs. Browning.—6.† Absolved; freed. Chaucer. 7. In metaph. (a) not relative; as, absolute knowledge, that is, immediate knowledge of things as they exist in themselves, as distinguished from relative knowledge, which is a knowledge of things as they appear to the percipient mind. (b) Existing independent of any other cause; self-existing; self-sufficing; existing without condition or relation; unconditioned; as, God is absolute. (c) In the philosophy of Sir W. Hamilton, unconditionally limited; having limits which belong unconditionally to the object: opposed to infinite.—8. In gram. applied to the case used to express certain circumstances adverbially when the case is not determined by any other word in the sentence; as, the genitive absolute in Greek, and the ablative absolute in Latin.—9. In chem. pure; unmixed; as, absolute alcohol.—Absolute equation, in astron. the sum of the optic and eccentric equations. The apparent inequality of a planet's motion in its orbit, arising from its unequal distances from the earth at different times, is called its optic equation; this would subsist if the planet's real motion was uniform. The eccentric inequality is caused by the planet's motion not being uniform.—Absolute term or number, in alg. that term which is completely known, and to which all the other part of an equation is made equal; thus, in the equation $x^2+12x=24$, the absolute term is 24.—Absolute motion, the absolute change of place in a moving body, independent of the motion of any other body.—Absolute magnitude of a force, the intensity of a force measured by weight, as by pounds, &c.—Absolute gravity, that by which a body descends freely and perpendicularly in a vacuum or non-resisting medium; or it may be considered as the whole force with which a body is impelled toward the centre of attraction, without regard to modifying circumstances.—SYN. Positive, peremptory, certain, unconditional, arbitrary, despotic, unconditioned, unrelated.

Absolute (ab'sō-lūt), n. In metaph. (a) that which exists independent of condition or relation; the self-existent unalterable original; the ultimate cause of all phenomena: always preceded by the definite article—the absolute.

All philosophy aims at a knowledge of the absolute under different phases. Fleming.

(b) In the philosophy of Sir W. Hamilton, that which is unconditionally limited; that to which limits belong in the very nature of things.

The unconditionally unlimited, or the infinite, the unconditionally limited, or the absolute, cannot positively be construed by the mind. Sir W. Hamilton.

Absolutely (ab'sō-lūt-li), adv. Completely; wholly; without restriction, limitation, or qualification; unconditionally; positively; peremptorily.

Absolutely we cannot discommend, we cannot absolutely approve, either willingness to live or forwardness to die. Hooker.

Command me absolutely not to go. Milton.

Absoluteness (ab'sō-lūt-nes), n. The state of being absolute; independence; completeness; the state of being subject to no extraneous restriction or control; positiveness.

Absolution (ab-sō-lū'shon), n. [L. absolutio. See ABSOLVE.] 1. The act of absolving or state of being absolved; release from consequences, obligations, or penalties; specifically, in the Roman Catholic and some other churches, a remission of sins pronounced by a priest in favour of a penitent. Protestants ascribe a declarative, but not an efficient power to absolution. It announces and assures forgiveness, on the ground of repentance, but does not impart it.—2. In the following passage the meaning is doubtful, perhaps finish; polish.

Some men are tall and big; so some language is high and great. Then the words are chosen, their sound ample, the composition full, the absolution plenteous, and poured out, all grave, sinewy, and strong. B. Jonson, Discoveries.

Absolutism (ab'sō-lūt-izm), n. 1. State of being absolute, or principles of absolute government.

If the emperors cannot acquiesce in this, the other road is to complete absolutism. Times newspaper.

2. Doctrine of predestination or absolute decrees.

Absolutist (ab'sō-lūt-ist), n. 1. An advocate for despotism, or for absolute government. 2. In metaph. one who maintains that it is possible to realize a cognition or concept of the absolute.

Hence the necessity which compelled Schelling and the absolutists to place the absolute in the indifference of subject and object, of knowledge and existence. Sir W. Hamilton.

Absolutistic (ab'sō-lūt-ist''ik), a. Pertaining to absolutism.

Absolutory (ab-sol'ū-to-ri), a. Absolving or capable of absolving. 'An absolutory sentence.' Ayliffe.

Absolvable (ab-solv'a-bl), a. That may be absolved.

Absolvatory (ab-solv'a-to-ri), a. Conferring absolution, pardon, or release; having power to absolve.

Absolve (ab-solv'), v.t. pret. & pp. absolved; ppr. absolving. [L. absolvo, to set free—ab, from, and solvo, to loose, to solve.] 1. To set free or release from some duty, obligation, or responsibility; as, to absolve a person from a promise.—2. To free from the consequences or penalties attaching to actions; to acquit; specifically, in eccles. law, to forgive or grant remission of sins to; to pronounce forgiveness of sins to.—3.† To accomplish; to finish. 'The work begun, how soon absolved.' Milton.—4.† To solve; to resolve; to explain. 'Absolve we this?' Young.

We shall not absolve the doubt. Sir T. Browne.

SYN. To free, release, exonerate, discharge, acquit, pardon.

Absolver (ab-solv'ėr), n. One who absolves; one that pronounces sin to be remitted.

Absolvitor (ab-solv'i-tor), n. In law, a decree of absolution.—Decree of absolvitor, in Scots law, a decree in favour of the defender in an action. A decree in favour of the pursuer is called a decree condemnator.

Absonant† (ab'sō-nant), a. [L. ab, from, and sonans, ppr. of sonare, to sound. See ABSONOUS.] Wide from the purpose; contrary; discordant: opposed to consonant. 'Absonant to nature.' Quarles.

Absonate† (ab'sō-nāt), v.t. To avoid; to detest. Ash.

Absonous† (ab'sō-nus), a. [L. absonus—ab, from, and sonus, sound.] 1. Unmusical. 2. Fig. discordant; opposed; contrary. 'Absonous to our reason.' Glanville.

Absorb (ab-sorb'), v.t. [L. absorbeo—ab, from, and sorbeo, to suck in.] 1. To drink in; to suck up; to imbibe, as a sponge; to take in by absorption, as the lacteals of the body. 2. To swallow up; to engulf, as a body in a whirlpool.

And dark oblivion soon absorbs them all. Cowper.

3. To waste wholly or sink in expenses; to exhaust; as, to absorb an estate in luxury.—4. To engross or engage wholly; as, these studies quite absorbed his attention.—5. To take up or receive in, as by chemical or molecular action, as when carbon absorbs gases. 6. In med. to counteract or neutralize; as, magnesia absorbs acidity in the stomach. —Absorb, Engross. Absorb rather refers to the occupation of one's mind or attention in anything so that the person is withdrawn from his external surroundings for the time being, a certain amount of passivity being attached to the use of the word; engross is rather to engage one's whole attention and energies, thus implying activity; thus one is absorbed in a novel, but engrossed in business: the words, however, are sometimes interchangeable.

Absorbability (ab-sorb'a-bil''i-ti), n. The state or quality of being absorbable.

Absorbable (ab-sorb'a-bl), a. Capable of being absorbed or imbibed.

Absorbed (ab-sorbd'), p. and a. Specifically, applied to pictures in which the oil has sunk into the canvas, leaving the colour flat and the touches dead or indistinct: nearly synonymous with chilled.

Absorbent (ab-sorb'ent), a. Capable of absorbing fluids; imbibing; swallowing; performing the function of absorption; as, absorbent vessels; absorbent system. See the noun.—Absorbent grounds, in painting, picture grounds prepared either in board or canvas, so as to have the power of imbibing the redundant oil from the colours, for the sake of expedition, or to increase the brilliancy of the colours.

Absorbent (ab-sorb'ent), n. Anything which absorbs; specifically, (a) in anat. and physiol. a vessel which imbibes or takes in nutritive matters into the system; specifically, in the vertebrate class of animals, one of a system of vessels ramifying through the body and forming a connecting link between the digestive and the circulatory systems, that is, acting as the media through which matters are absorbed from the alimentary canal on the one hand, and from the blood and tissues on the other. They are denominated, according to the liquids which they convey, lacteals or lymphatics, which both end in a common trunk called the thoracic duct. (b) In med. a medicine which neutralizes acidity in the stomach and bowels, as magnesia, prepared chalk, &c. (c) In surg. a substance, as cobweb, sponge, &c., applied to a bleeding surface to arrest hemorrhage, by forming with the blood a solid adhesive compound. (d) In chem. anything that takes up into itself a gas or liquid, as a substance which withdraws moisture from the air; also a substance, such as magnesia, lime, &c., which neutralizes acids.

Absorbing (ab-sorb'ing), p. and a. Imbibing; engrossing; as, the spectacle was most absorbing. — Absorbing well, a shaft sunk through an impermeable bed or stratum into a permeable one so as to carry off water conveyed into it. Such wells are employed in mining and manufactures to carry off excess of drainage water or water defiled by noxious substances. Called also Dead Well.

Absorbition† (ab-sor-bi'shon), n. Absorption.

Absorpt† (ab-sorpt'). Same as Absorbed.

Absorptiometer (ab-sorp'shi-om''et-ėr), n. [L. absorptio, absorption, and Gr. metron, a measure.] An instrument invented by Professor Bunsen to determine the amount of gas absorbed by a unit volume of liquid. It is a graduated tube in which a certain quantity of the gas and liquid is agitated over mercury. The amount of absorption is measured on the scale by the height the mercury presses up the liquid in the tube.

Absorption (ab-sorp'shon), n. [L. absorptio. See ABSORB.] The act or process of absorbing, or state of being absorbed in all the senses of the verb; as, (a) the act or process of imbibing, swallowing, engulfing mechanically. (b) The condition of having one's attention entirely occupied with something. (c) In chem. and physics, a taking in or reception by molecular or chemical action, as absorption of gases, light, heat; as, the absorption of heat by surrounding bodies; absorption of electricity. (d) In physiol. one of the vital organic functions by which the materials of growth and nutrition are absorbed and conveyed to the organs of plants and animals. In vertebrate animals this is performed by the absorbent system, consisting of the lymphatics and lacteals and their connected glands. Plants absorb moisture and nutritive juices principally by their roots, but sometimes by their general surfaces, as in sea-weeds, and carbonic acid by their leaves. — Interstitial absorption. See under INTERSTITIAL. — Cutaneous or external absorption, in med. the process by which certain substances, when placed in contact with a living surface, produce the same effects upon the system as when taken into the stomach or injected into the veins, only in a less degree. Thus, arsenic, when applied to an external wound, will sometimes affect the system as rapidly as when introduced into the stomach; and mercury, applied externally, has the effect of exciting salivation.—Absorption of colour, the phenomenon observed when certain colours are retained or prevented from passing through certain transparent bodies; thus pieces of coloured glass are almost opaque to some parts of the spectrum, while allowing other colours to pass through freely. The absorption of light is the same kind of phenomenon. — Absorption of light, that quality in an imperfectly transparent or opaque body by which some portion of an incident pencil of light is retained within the body, while the rest is either transmitted through it or reflected from it. It is owing to this that a certain thickness of pure water shows a greenish colour, glass a bluish-green colour. — Absorption lines, in spectrum analysis, dark lines produced in a spectrum by the absorbing of a portion of the light by a vapour intervening between the source of light and the spectroscope.—Absorption spectrum, a spectrum with absorption lines.—Absorption of heat, that quality in an imperfectly polished or opaque body by which the rays of heat impinging on its surface enter its body to be distributed afterwards by radiation; absorption is in inverse ratio to reflection.

Absorptive (ab-sorp'tiv), a. [Fr. absorptif.] Having power to absorb or imbibe.

Absorptivity (ab-sorp-tiv'i-ti), n. The power or capacity of absorption. 'The absorptivity inherent in organic beings.' Dana. [Rare.]

Absquatulate (ab-skwot'ū-lāt), v.i. To run away; to abscond; to make off. [An American vulgarism.]

Absque hoc (abz'kwe hok). [L.] Without this or that; specifically, in law, words used in traversing what has been alleged, and is repeated.

Abstain (ab-stān'), v.i. [Norm. absteigner, Fr. abstenir, to hold one's self back, to abstain; L. abstineo, to keep from—abs, from, and teneo, to hold. Contain, tenant, tenacious, &c., are from the same stem.] To forbear or refrain from voluntarily, especially to refrain from what gratifies the passions or appetites; to refrain; to forbear; to withhold; as, to abstain from the use of ardent spirits; to abstain from luxuries.

Abstain from meats offered to idols. Acts xv. 29.

Abstainer (ab-stān'ėr), n. One who abstains; specifically, one who abstains from the use of intoxicating liquors; a teetotaller.

Abstemious (ab-stē'mi-us), a. [L. abstemius —abs, and root seen in temetum, strong drink. temulentus, drunken; Skr. tim, to be wet.] 1. Sparing in diet; refraining from a free use of food and strong drinks; temperate; abstinent.

Under his special eye
Abstemious I grew up and thrived amain. Milton.

Instances of longevity are chiefly among the abstemious. Arbuthnot.

2. Characterized by great temperance; very moderate and plain; very sparing; spare; as, an abstemious diet: opposed to luxurious or rich.—3. Devoted to or spent in abstemiousness or abstinence; as, an abstemious life.

Till yonder sun descend, O let me pay
To grief and anguish one abstemious day. Pope.

4. Promoting or favouring abstemiousness; associated with abstemiousness. [Rare.]

Such is the virtue of th' abstemious well. Dryden.

Abstemiously (ab-stē'mi-us-li), adv. In an abstemious manner; temperately; with a sparing use of meat or drink.

Abstemiousness (ab-stē'mi-us-nes), n. The quality or habit of being temperate or sparing in the use of food and strong drinks. [This word expresses a greater degree of abstinence than temperance.]

Abstention (ab-sten'shon), n. [L. abstentio. See ABSTAIN.] The act of holding off or abstaining; abstinence.

As may well be supposed, this abstention of our light cavalry was observed by the Russians with surprise and thankfulness, by the head-quarters staff of the English with surprise and vexation, by the French with surprise and curiosity. Kinglake.

Absterge (ab-stėrj'), v.t. pret. & pp. absterged; ppr. absterging. [L. abstergeo, to wipe off—abs, and tergeo, to wipe.] 1. To wipe, or make clean by wiping; to wash away. 'To absterge, belike, that fulsomeness of sweat to which they are then subject.' Sir T. Browne.—2. In med. to cleanse by lotions, as a wound or ulcer; also, to purge. See DETERGE.

Abstergent (ab-stėrj'ent), a. Having cleansing or purgative properties.

Abstergent (ab-stėrj'ent), n. 1. Whatever aids in scouring or cleansing, as soap or fuller's earth.—2. In med. a lotion or other application for cleansing a sore: in this sense nearly superseded by detergent.

Absterse (ab-stėrs'), v.t. To absterge; to cleanse; to purify. Sir T. Browne. [Rare.]

Abstersion (ab-stėr'shon), n. [L. abstersio. See ABSTERGE.] 1. The act of wiping clean. 'Ablution and abstersion.' Sir W. Scott. 2. In med. a cleansing by medicines which remove foulness about sores, or humours or obstructions from the system.

Abstersion is plainly a scouring off or incision of the more viscous humours, and making the humours more fluid; and cutting between them and the part. Bacon.

Abstersive (ab-stėrs'iv), a. Cleansing; having the quality of removing foulness. See DETERSIVE.

The seats with purple clothe in order due,
And let the abstersive sponge the board renew. Pope.

Abstersive (ab-stėrs'iv), n. That which effects abstersion; that which purifies.

Abstersives are fuller's earth, soap, linseed-oil, and ox-gall. Bp. Sprat.

Abstersiveness (ab-stėrs'iv-nes), n. Quality of being abstersive or abstergent. 'A caustick or a healing faculty, abstersiveness, and the like.' Boyle.

Abstinence (ab'sti-nens), n. [L. abstinentia. See ABSTAIN.] 1. In general, the act or practice of voluntarily refraining from the use of anything within our reach; forbearing any action; abnegation.

Since materials are destroyed as such by being once used, the whole of the labour required for their protection, as well as the abstinence of the persons who supplied the means for carrying it on, must be remunerated. J. S. Mill.

More specifically—2. The refraining from indulgence in the pleasures of the table, or from customary gratifications of any animal or sensual propensities. It denotes either a total forbearance, or a forbearance of the usual quantity.

Against diseases here the strongest fence
Is the defensive virtue abstinence. Herrick.

Men flew to frivolous amusements and to criminal pleasures with greediness which long and enforced abstinence naturally produces. Macaulay.

3. In a still narrower sense: (a) forbearance from the use of ardent spirits: in this sense abstinence is usually preceded by the adjective total. (b) Eccles. the refraining from certain kinds of food on certain days, as flesh on Fridays.

Abstinency (ab'sti-nen-si), n. Same as Abstinence. [Rare.]

Abstinent (ab'sti-nent), a. [L. abstinens, abstinentis. See ABSTAIN.] Refraining from indulgence, especially in the use of food and drink.

Abstinent (ab'sti-nent), n. 1. One of a sect which appeared in France and Spain in the third century, who opposed marriage, condemned the use of flesh meat, and placed the Holy Spirit in the class of created beings.—2. A name sometimes given to a teetotaller.

Abstinently (ab'sti-nent-li), adv. In an abstinent manner; with abstinence.

Abstorted † (ab-stort'ed), a. [L. abs, and tortus, pp. of torqueo, tortum, to wrench. See TORTURE.] Forced away. Bailey.

Abstract (ab-strakt'), v.t. [From L. abstraho, abstractum, to draw away—abs, and traho, tractum, to draw, which appears also in contract, detract, retract, &c., and is allied to E. drag.] 1. To draw away; to take away; to withdraw; as, to abstract the attention of any one.—2. To take away mentally; to separate, as the qualities or properties of an object in the mind; to consider separately; as, to abstract ideas.—3. To derive the idea of; to receive suggestions of; to deduce.

And thus from divers accidents and acts
Which do within her observation fall,
The goddesses and powers divine abstracts,
As Nature, Fortune, and the Virtues all.
Sir J. Davies.

4. To select or separate the substance of a book or writing; to epitomize or reduce to a summary.

Let us abstract them into brief compends. Watts.

5. To take secretly for one's own use from the property of another when placed in one's power; to purloin; as, to abstract goods from a parcel or money from a bank.—6. To separate, as the spirits or more volatile part from any substance by distillation: but in this sense extract is now more generally used. 'Having abstracted the whole spirit.' Boyle.

Abstract (ab-strakt'), v.i. To form abstractions; to separate ideas; to distinguish between the attribute and the concrete in which it exists. 'Brutes abstract not.' Locke. —To abstract from, to separate our thoughts from; to leave out of consideration.

Could we abstract from these pernicious effects, and suppose this were innocent, it would be too light to be matter of praise. Dr. H. More.

Abstract (ab'strakt), a. [L. abstractus, pp. of abstraho, abstractum. See ABSTRACT, v.t.] 1. Considered in itself; treated by itself; considered and treated apart from any application to a particular object; as, abstract mathematics; abstract logic.—2. Not concrete; very general; hence, abstruse, difficult; as, a very abstract subject of disquisition. In metaph. an abstract idea is an idea separated from a complex object, or from other ideas which naturally accompany it, as the solidity of marble contemplated apart from its colour or figure. In gram. and logic, abstract nouns or terms are names of qualities, in opposition to concrete, which are names of things. Some metaphysicians understand by abstract terms all names which are the result of abstraction or generalization. This latter usage is strongly condemned by J. S. Mill (Log. i. 2, § 4), who applies to such words the term general names.—Abstract or pure mathematics is that which treats of the properties of magnitude, figure, or quantity, absolutely and generally considered, without restriction to any particular object, such as arithmetic and geometry. Abstract mathematics is thus distinguished from mixed mathematics, in which simple and abstract quantities previously considered in the former are applied to particular sensible objects, as astronomy, mechanics, optics, &c.—Abstract numbers are assemblages of units considered independently of any thing or things that they might otherwise be supposed to represent. For example, 5 is an abstract number while it remains independent; but if we say 5 feet or 5 miles it is no longer an abstract but a concrete number.—3.† Having the senses unemployed; insensible to outward objects; abstracted. 'Abstract as in a trance.' Milton. 4. Lacking a concrete object; refined; pure. [Rare.]

Love's not so pure and abstract, as they use
To say, which have no mistress but their muse.
Donne.

Abstract (ab'strakt), n. 1. That which concentrates in itself the essential qualities of anything more extensive or more general, or of several things; the essence: now almost, if not quite exclusively applied to a summary or epitome containing the substance, a general view, or the principal heads of a treatise or writing.

You shall there find a man who is the abstract of all faults all men follow. Shak.

When Mnemon came to the end of a chapter he recollected the sentiments that he had remarked; so that he could give a tolerable analysis and abstract of every treatise he had read just after he had finished it. Watts.

Specifically—2. In arch. and engin. that portion of the bill of quantities, estimate, or account, which contains the summary of the various detailed articles: it is upon this abstract that the prices are applied.—3. A catalogue; an inventory. [Rare.]

He hath an abstract for the remembrance of such places, and goes to them by his note. Shak.

4. In gram. an abstract term or noun.

The concrete 'like' has its abstract 'likeness;' the concretes 'father' and 'son' have, or might have, the abstracts 'paternity' and 'filiety' or 'filiation.' J. S. Mill.

—In the abstract, in a state of separation; as, a subject considered in the abstract, i.e. without reference to particular applications. —Abstract of title, in law, an epitome or short statement of the evidences of ownership.—Abridgment, Compendium, Epitome, Abstract. See under ABRIDGMENT.

Abstracted (ab-strakt'ed), pp. and a. 1. Separated.

The evil one abstracted stood from his own evil.
Milton.

2. Refined; exalted. 'Abstracted spiritual love.' Donne.—3. Difficult; abstruse; abstract. Johnson.—4. Absent in mind; inattentive.

And now no more the abstracted ear attends
The water's murmuring lapse. T. Warton.

—Absent, Abstracted. See under ABSENT.

Abstractedly (ab-strakt'ed-li), adv. 1. In a separate state, or in contemplation only.

Deeming the exception to be rather a case abstractedly possible, than one which is frequently realized in fact. J. S. Mill.

2. In an abstracted or absent manner.

Abstractedness (ab-strakt'ed-nes), n. The state of being abstracted; abstractness. 'The abstractedness of these speculations.' Hume.

Abstracter (ab-strakt'ėr), n. One who abstracts; as, (a) one who makes an abstract or summary. (b) One who purloins.

Abstraction (ab-strak'shon), n. [L. abstractio. See ABSTRACT, v.t.] 1. The act of abstracting or separating; the act of withdrawing; withdrawal; as, the abstraction of heat from the body. Specifically—2. The act of separating mentally the qualities or properties of an object; the act of considering separately what is united in a complex object. Thus, when the mind considers the branch of a tree by itself, or the colour of the leaves, as separate from their size or figure, the act is called abstraction. So also when it considers whiteness, softness, virtue, existence, as separate from any particular objects. Abstraction is the ground-work of classification, by which things are arranged in orders, genera, and species. We separate in idea the qualities of certain objects which are of the same kind, from others which are different in each, and arrange the objects having the same properties in a class or collected body.

If, in contemplating several objects, and finding that they agree in certain points, we abstract the circumstances of agreement, disregarding the differences, and give to all and each of these objects a name applicable to them in respect of this agreement, i.e. a common name, as 'rose;' or again, if we give a name to some attribute wherein they agree, as 'fragrance' or 'redness,' we are then said to generalize. Abstraction, therefore, does not necessarily imply generalization, though generalization implies abstraction. Whately.

3. The act of ascending from what is concrete and particular to what is abstract and general; the act of refining or sublimating.

This was an age of vision and mystery; and every work was believed to contain a double or secondary meaning. Nothing escaped this eccentric spirit of refinement and abstraction. T. Warton.

4. Something abstract; an idea or notion of an abstract character; an idea or notion having no discoverable relation to fact or practice; a theoretical, impracticable notion.

What are metaphysics themselves but intricate subtilties and fruitless abstractions? Butler.

5. A separation from worldly objects; a recluse life; as, a hermit's abstraction.—6. Absence of mind; inattention to present objects; the state of being engrossed with any matter to the exclusion of everything else; as, a fit of abstraction.—7. The taking for one's own use part of the property of another.—8. In distillation, the separation of volatile parts from those which are fixed. It is chiefly used when a fluid is repeatedly poured upon any substance in a retort, and distilled off, to change its state, or the nature of its composition.

Abstractitious † (ab'strak-ti''shus), a. Abstracted or drawn from other substances, particularly from vegetables, without fermentation. Ash.

Abstractive (ab-strakt'iv), a. 1. Having the power or quality of abstracting. 'The abstractive faculty.' Is. Taylor.—2.† Abstractitious.

Abstractively (ab-strakt'iv-li), adv. In an abstractive manner; in or by itself; abstractly. [Rare or obsolete.]

The life which abstractively is good, by accidents and adherences may become unfortunate. Feltham.

Abstractly (ab-strakt'li), adv. In an abstract manner or state; absolutely; in a state or manner unconnected with anything else; in or by itself; as, matter abstractly considered.

Abstractness (ab'strakt-nes), n. The state or quality of being abstract; a state of being in contemplation only, or not connected with any object. 'The abstractness of the ideas themselves.' Locke.

Abstriction (ab-strik'shon), n. [L. ab, from, and stringo, strictum, to bind.] The act of unbinding. [Rare.]

Abstringe † (ab-strinj'), v.t. [L. abstringo—ab, and stringo, to bind.] To unbind.

Abstrude (ab-strōd'), v.t. [L. abstrudo—ab or abs, and trudo, trusum, to thrust.] To thrust away. Johnson.

Abstruse (ab-strūs'), a. [L. abstrusus, pp. of abstrudo, to thrust away.] 1. Withdrawn from view; out of the way; concealed. 'Hidden in the most abstruse dungeons of Barbary.' Shelton.—2. Remote from apprehension; difficult to be comprehended or understood; profound; opposed to what is obvious.

It must be still confessed that there are some mysteries in religion, both natural and revealed, as well as some abstruse points in philosophy, wherein the wise as well as the unwise must be content with obscure ideas. Watts.

Abstrusely (ab-strūs'li), adv. In an abstruse manner; in a manner not to be easily understood.

Abstruseness (ab-strūs'nes), n. The state or quality of being abstruse, or difficult to be understood.

Abstrusion (ab-strö'zhon), n. The act of thrusting away. [Rare.]

Abstrusity† (ab-strūs'i-ti), n. Abstruseness; that which is abstruse. 'Matters of difficulty and such which were not without abstrusities.' Sir T. Browne.

Absume† (ab-sūm'), v.t. [L. absumo—ab, and sumo, to take.] To bring to an end by a gradual waste; to consume; to destroy; to cause to disappear. Boyle.

Absumption† (ab-sump'shon), n. [L. absumptio. See ABSUME.] Destruction. 'The total defect or absumption of religion.' Bp. Gauden.

Absurd (ab-sėrd'), a. [L. absurdus—ab, and surdus, deaf, insensible. See SURD.] 1. Acting in a manner contrary to common sense or sound judgment; inconsistent with common sense; ridiculous; nonsensical; as, an absurd fellow; an absurd statement; absurd conduct.

A man who cannot write with wit on a proper subject is dull and stupid; but one who shews it in an improper place is as impertinent and absurd. Addison.

Specifically—2. In logic or philos. inconsistent with reason; logically contradictory; impossible; as, that the whole is less than the sum of its parts is an absurd hypothesis; an absurd proposition.—Absurd, Foolish, Irrational, Infatuated, Preposterous. Absurd, opposed to common sense, and hence often exciting ridicule or amusement; foolish, characterized by weakness of mind or silliness; foolish conduct is such as gives rise to a certain feeling of contempt; irrational, plainly and evidently opposed to reason; infatuated, driven on by fate, not under the control of reason, possessed or caused by some misleading but overmastering idea; preposterous is not used of persons, and when used of actions, modes of procedure, &c., expresses a very high degree of absurdity, as much as amounts to putting the cart before the horse.

'Tis phrase absurd to call a villain great. Pope.

I am a very foolish, fond old man. Shak.

It seemed utterly irrational any longer to maintain it. Is. Taylor.

The people are so infatuated that if a cow falls sick, it is ten to one but an old woman is clapt up in prison for it. Addison.

Though the error be easily fallen into, it is manifestly preposterous. Is. Taylor.

SYN. Foolish, irrational, ridiculous, preposterous, nonsensical, inconsistent, incongruous.

Absurd (ab-sėrd'), n. An act of absurdity. [Rare.]

This arch absurd that wit and fool delights. Pope.

Absurdity (ab-sėrd'i-ti), n. [L. absurditas; Fr. absurdité.] 1. The quality of being absurd or inconsistent with obvious truth, reason, or sound judgment; want of rationality or common sense; as, the absurdity of such an idea; the absurdity of his conduct. 2. That which is absurd; an absurd action: in this sense it has a plural; as, the absurdities of men.—SYN. Folly, foolishness, inconsistency, preposterousness, self-contradiction, unreasonableness.

Absurdly (ab-sėrd'li), adv. In an absurd manner; in a manner inconsistent with reason or obvious propriety.

Absurdness (ab-sėrd'nes), n. The same as Absurdity.

Abthane, Abthain (ab'thān), n. [Gael. abdhaine, an abbacy.] 1. An abbacy in early Scotland.—2. A superior rank of thane: an erroneous use of the word.

Abuna (a-bö'na), n. The head of the Christian church in Abyssinia.

Abundance (a-bun'dans), n. [L. abundantia, abundance, from abundo, to abound (which see).] A fulness or plenteousness great to overflowing; great plenty; ample sufficiency: strictly applicable to quantity only; as, abundance of corn; abundance of rain; but used also of number; as, an abundance of peasants: when used absolutely, sometimes equivalent to abundant wealth or means; riches; affluence; as, to give of one's abundance.—SYN. Plenteousness, plentifulness, plenitude, plenty, copiousness, riches, affluence, wealth.

Abundant (a-bun'dant), a. 1. Plentiful; in great quantity; fully sufficient; as, an abundant supply.—2. Abounding; overflowing.

The Lord . . . abundant in goodness and truth. Ex. xxxiv. 6.

The history of our species is a history of the evils that have flowed from a source as tainted as it is abundant. Brougham.

—Abundant number, in arith. a number the sum of whose aliquot parts exceeds the number itself. Thus, 12 is an abundant number, for the sum of its aliquot parts 1+2+3+4+6=16. It is thus distinguished from a perfect number, which is equal to the sum of all its aliquot parts, as 6=1+2+3; and from a deficient number, which is greater than the sum of all its aliquot parts, as 14, which is greater than 1+2+7.—SYN. Plentiful, copious, ample, plenteous, exuberant, overflowing, rich.

Abundantly (a-bun'dant-li), adv. In a plentiful or sufficient degree; fully; amply; plentifully.

Abune (a-bün'), adv. and prep. [Contr. for aboven, abuven, A. Sax. abufan.] Above; beyond; in a greater or higher degree. Written also Aboon. [Scotch.]

A-burton (a-bėr'ton), adv. Naut. applied to casks when placed athwartships in the hold.

Abusable (a-būz'a-bl), a. That may be abused.

Abusage† (a-būz'āj), n. Abuse.

Abuse (a-būz'), v.t. pret. & pp. abused; ppr. abusing. [Fr. abuser; L. abutor, abusus—ab, and utor, to use. See USE.] 1. To use ill; to misuse; to put to a wrong or bad use; to divert from the proper use; to misapply; as, to abuse rights or privileges; to abuse words. 'They that use this world as not abusing it.' 1 Cor. vii. 31.—2. To do wrong to; to act injuriously towards; to injure; to disgrace; to dishonour; to slander.

He shall not abuse Robert Shallow, esquire. Shak.

I swear 'tis better to be much abused
Than but to know't a little. Shak.

Poor soul, thy face is much abused with tears. Shak.

3. To violate; to ravish; to defile.—4. To treat with contumelious language; to revile.

He mocked them, and laughed at them, and abused them shamefully. 1 Mac. vii. 34.

5. To deceive; to impose on; to corrupt or seduce by cajolery. Shakspere has, 'You are a great deal abused,' in the sense of, You are much mistaken.

Nor be with all these tempting words abused. Pope.

SYN. To misuse, maltreat, injure, deceive, revile, reproach, vilify.

Abuse (a-būs'), n. 1. Ill use; improper treatment or employment; application to a wrong purpose; improper use or application; as, an abuse of our natural powers; an abuse of civil rights, or of religious privileges; abuse of advantages; abuse of words, &c. 'Perverts best things to worst abuse, or to their meanest use.' Milton.—2. A corrupt practice or custom; an offence; a crime; a fault; as, the abuses of government.

If abuses be not remedied they will certainly increase. Swift.

No, I am that I am, and they that level
At my abuses reckon up their own. Shak.

3. Ill-treatment of a person; injury; insult; dishonour; especially, ill-treatment in words; contumelious language. 'Exposed to daily fraud, contempt, abuse, and wrong.' Milton. 4. Seduction. 'For him to have deceived me, and . . . after the abuse forsaken me.' Sir P. Sidney.—5.† Deception.

Is it some abuse, and no such thing? Shak.

—Abuse of distress, in law, using an animal or chattel distrained, which makes the distrainer liable, as for wrongful appropriation.—Abuse, Invective. 'Abuse as compared with invective is more personal and coarse, being conveyed in harsh and unseemly terms, and dictated by angry feeling and bitter temper. Invective is more commonly aimed at character or conduct, and may be conveyed in writing and in refined language, and dictated by indignation against what is in itself blameworthy. It often, however, means public abuse under such restraints as are imposed by position and education.' C. J. Smith.

Abuseful (a-būs'fụl), a. Using or practising abuse; abusive. 'The abuseful names of hereticks and schismaticks.' Bp. Barlow. [Rare or obsolete.]

Abusefulness (ab-ūs'fụl-nes), n. Want or absence of usefulness. [Probably coined by Mr. Ruskin.]

And it depends on the person much more than on the article whether its usefulness or abusefulness will be the quality developed in it. Ruskin.

Abuser (a-būz'ėr), n. One who abuses, in speech or behaviour; one that deceives; a ravisher. 'Next thou, th' abuser of thy prince's ear.' Sir J. Denham. 'That vile abuser of young maidens.' J. Fletcher.

Abusio (a-bū'zi-ō), n. [L.] In rhet. a figure of speech by which words are used with some deviation from their proper meaning.

Abusion† (a-bū'zhon), n. 1. Abuse; evil or corrupt usage; reproach. 'Redress the abusions and exactions.' 23 Hen. VIII. xxxiii.

Shame light on him, that through so false illusion
Doth turn the name of souldiers to abusion.
Spenser.

2. Deceit; illusion.

They speken of magic and abusion. Chaucer.

Abusive (a-būs'iv), a. 1. Practising abuse; offering harsh words or ill-treatment; as, an abusive author; an abusive fellow.—2. Containing abuse, or serving as the instrument of abuse; rude; reproachful; as, abusive words.—3.† Misleading or tending to mislead; employed by misuse; improper.

In describing these battles, I am, for distinction sake, necessitated to use the word Parliament improperly, according to the abusive acception thereof for these latter years. Fuller.

SYN. Reproachful, scurrilous, opprobrious, insolent, insulting, injurious, offensive, reviling.

Abusively (a-būs'iv-li), adv. 1. In an abusive manner; rudely; reproachfully.—2.† Improperly; by misuse. 'Words being carelessly and abusively admitted, and as inconstantly retained.' Glanville.

Abusiveness (a-būs'iv-nes), n. The quality of being abusive; rudeness of language, or violence to the person; ill-usage.

Abut (a-but'), v.i. [Fr. aboutir, to meet at the end, to border on—a, at, and bout, extremity. See BUTT.] To be contiguous; to join at a border or boundary; to form a point or line of contact; to terminate; to rest: with on, upon, against; as, his land abuts upon mine; the building abuts on the highway; the bridge abuts against the solid rock.

Abutilon (ab-ū'ti-lon), n. [Arabic name.] A genus of plants, nat. order Malvaceæ, of wide distribution; the Indian mallows. The large flowers of the A. esculentum are boiled and eaten in Brazil. Some species are favourite garden and greenhouse plants, of which A. vexillarium is an exuberant and showy climber.

Abutment (a-but'ment), n. 1. The condition of abutting.—2. That which abuts or borders on anything else; the part abutting; specifically, that which receives the end of, and gives support to, anything having a tendency to spread or thrust outwards, or in a horizontal direction, as the solid part of a pier or wall against which an arch abuts, or from which it springs. See BRIDGE.

Abuttal (a-but'al), n. The abutting or boundary of a piece of land; a portion of land contiguous to another.

Abuttal (a-but'al), v.i. To abut, as pieces of land. Spelman.

Abutter (a-but'ėr), n. That which abuts.

Abutting (a-but'ting), p. and a. Approaching or advancing towards each other; contiguous.

Whose high upreared and abutting fronts
The perilous, narrow ocean parts asunder. Shak.

Abuy (a-bī'), v.t. [See ABY.] To pay the penalty of.

When a holy man abuys so dearly such a slight frailty, of a credulous mistaking, what shall become of our heinous and presumptuous sins? Bp. Hall.

Abuzz (a-buz'), a. or adv. Buzzing; filled with buzzing sounds: not used attributively.

The court was all astir and abuzz. Dickens.

Abvacuation† (ab-vak'ū-ā''shon), n. [L. ab, from, and vacuo, vacuatum, to empty.] Same as Abevacuation.

Abvolate† (ab'vō-lāt), v.t. [L. ab, from, and volo, volatum, to fly.] To fly from.

Abvolation (ab-vō-lā'shon), n. The act of flying from. [Rare.]

Aby† (a-bī'), v.i. [A softened form of abide, through influence of aby.] To hold out; to endure.

But nought that wanteth rest can long aby. Spenser.

Aby (a-bī'), v.t. pret. & pp. abought or abied. [A.Sax. abiegan, to buy back, to pay for, O.E. abygge, abugge, abegge, to pay a penalty, to aby—prefix a, back, and biegan, to buy. It is occasionally written abuy. See BUY.] To give or pay an equivalent for; to pay the penalty of; to atone for; to suffer for.

Whose hardie hand on her doth lay,
It dearely shall aby, and death for handsell pay.
Spenser.

She hath dearly abied it. Sir W. Scott.

Abyme.† Same as Abysm. Written also Abime.

Abysm (a-bizm'), n. [O. Fr. abisme (Fr. abime), from L.L. abissimus, a superl. form from abyssus, an abyss. The Romans gave the superl. affix sometimes to nouns as well as to adjectives.] An abyss; a yawning gulf; a fathomless deep; a chasm. 'The abysm of hell.' Shak. 'Down some swart abysm.' Keats. [Poetical.]

Abysmal (a-biz'mal), a. Pertaining to an abyss; bottomless; profound; fathomless; immeasurable.

Geology gives one the same abysmal extent of time that astronomy does of space. Carlyle.

The Jews were struck dumb with abysmal terror. Macaulay.

Abyss (a-bis'), n. [Gr. abyssos, bottomless —a, priv., and byssos, bottom, Ionic for bythos.] 1. A bottomless gulf; any deep immeasurable space; anything profound and unfathomable, whether literally or figuratively; specifically, hell; the bottomless pit.

Thy throne is darkness, in the abyss of light. Milton.

Some laboured to fathom the abysses of metaphysical theology. Macaulay.

2. In her. the centre of an escutcheon.

Abyssal (a-bis'al), a. Relating to or like an abyss.—Abyssal zone, in phys. geog. that belt or zone of the sea farthest from the shore, and above 100 fathoms deep—so named by Professor E. Forbes in dividing the bottom of the sea into zones when describing its plants and animals.

Abyssinian (ab-is-sin'i-an), a. Belonging to Abyssinia or its inhabitants.

Abyssinian (ab-is-sin'i-an), n. 1. A native or inhabitant of Abyssinia.—2. A member of the Abyssinian Church.

Abyssus† (a-bis'us), n. Same as Abyss. Th. Jackson.

Acacia (a-kā'shi-a), n. [L. acacia, Gr. akakia, an Egyptian tree, the thorny acacia, from akē, a point.] 1. A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosæ, sub-order Mimoseæ, for the most part natives of Arabia, Barbary, and the East Indies. As objects of ornament the acacias are usually of striking beauty. Some of the species produce catechu, as A. Catechu, and some exude gum-arabic, as A. Verek, A. arabica, A. vera Acacia arabica.

(Egyptian thorn), A. Adansoni; the bark of others yields a large quantity of tannin, as A. decurrens and A. mollissima. Several species afford timber of good quality, as A. elata, xylocarpa, odoratissima, Sundra, &c.—2. In med. the inspissated juice of several species of acacia, known popularly as gum-arabic (which see).—3. A name given by antiquaries to an object somewhat like a roll or bag seen on medals in the hands of several consuls and emperors of the lower empire, the purpose of which has not yet been discovered.

Acacian (a-kā'shi-an), n. In eccles. hist. a member of certain sects of the fifth century, so denominated from their leaders, Acacius, bishop of Cæsarea, and Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople. Some of them maintained that the Son, though similar to, was not the same as the Father; others, that he was both distinct and dissimilar.

Acacia-tree (a-kā'shi-a-trē), n. A name sometimes applied to the false acacia or locust-tree (Robinia pseudacacia).

Acacio (a-kā'shi-ō), n. [See ACAJOU.] A heavy durable wood of the red-mahogany character, but darker and plainer. Called also Acajou.

Acacy† (ak'a-si), n. [Gr. akakia—a, priv., and kakos, bad.] Freedom from malice. Ash.

Academe (ak'a-dēm), n. [See ACADEMY.] 1. The garden at Athens where Plato taught; the Academy.—2. An academy. 'This your academe.' Tennyson.

Our court shall be a little academe. Shak.

Nor hath fair Europe her vast bounds throughout
An academe of note I found not out. Howell.

Academial (ak-a-dē'mi-al), a. Pertaining to an academy. Johnson. [Rare.]

Academian† (ak-a-dē'mi-an), n. A member of an academy; a student in a university or college. 'That new-discarded academian.' Marston.

Academic, Academical (ak-a-dem'ik, ak-a-dem'ik-al), a. [L. academicus; Fr. académique.] 1. Belonging to the school or philosophy of Plato: in this sense the form academic is exclusively, or almost exclusively, used.—2. Belonging to an academy, or to a college or university; as, academic studies.—Figure of academic proportions, in painting, a figure of little less than half the size of nature, such as it is the custom for pupils to draw from the antique and from life; also, any figure in an attitude conventional, or resembling those chosen in life academies, for the purpose of displaying to the students muscular action, form, and colour to the best advantage.

Academic (ak-a-dem'ik), n. 1. One who belonged to the school or adhered to the philosophy of Plato.—2. A student in a college or university. 'A young academic.' Watts.

Academical (ak-a-dem'i-kal), n. 1. A member of any academical club.—2. pl. The costume proper to the officers and students of a school or college.

Academically (ak-a-dem'ik-al-li), adv. In an academical manner.

Academician (ak'a-dē-mi''shan), n. A member of an academy or society for promoting arts and sciences; particularly, (a) a member of the Royal Academy of Arts; (b) a member of the French Academy. See ACADEMY, 3.

Academism (a-kad'em-izm), n. The doctrines of the Academic philosophy.

Academist (a-kad'em-ist), n. 1. An Academic philosopher.—2. A member of an academy. Ray.

Academy (a-kad'ē-mi), n. [L. academia, Gr. acadēmeia, the Academy, from the hero Acadēmus, to whom the ground originally belonged which formed the garden in which Plato taught.] 1. Originally, a garden, grove, or villa, near Athens, where Plato and his followers held their philosophical conferences; hence, Plato and his followers collectively; the members of the school of Plato.

Had the poor vulgar rout only been abused into such idolatrous superstitions, as to adore a marble or a golden deity, it might not so much be wondered at; but for the Academy to own such a paradox,—this was without excuse. South.

2. A school or seminary of learning, holding a rank between a university or college and an elementary school; also, a school for teaching a particular art or particular sciences; as, a military academy.—3. An association for the promotion of literature, science, or art, established sometimes by government, and sometimes by the voluntary union of private individuals. The members (Academicians), who are usually divided into ordinary, honorary, and corresponding members, either select their own department or follow those prescribed by the constitution of the society, and at regular meetings communicate the results of their labours in papers, of which the more important are afterwards printed. The French Academy, the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-lettres, the Academy of Sciences, the Academy of the Fine Arts, and the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences compose the French National Institute. The Royal Academy of Arts, in London, was founded in 1768 'for the purpose of cultivating and improving the arts of painting, sculpture, and architecture.' The number of academicians, originally thirty-six, is now forty-two, among whom are two engravers. The Royal Scottish Academy of Painting, Sculpture, and Architecture was founded in 1826 on the model of the London Academy. It was incorporated in 1838, and consists of thirty academicians.—Academy figure, in painting, an academic study; a drawing or painting of the human figure nude, or partially draped, such as is made by students of painting.

Acadian (a-kā'di-an), a. Belonging to Acadia or Nova Scotia.

Acadian (a-kā'di-an), n. A native or inhabitant of Acadia or Nova Scotia.

Acajou (ak'a-jö), n. [Fr. acajou, Sp. acaju, Pg. acaju, caju, It. acagiù, cajiù, mahogany, probably from Malay kāyu, a tree.] 1. A kind of heavy red mahogany; acacio.—2. A gum and resin from the stem of the mahogany-tree.

Acaleph, Acalephan (ak'a-lēf, ak-a-lē'fan), n. A member of the order Acalephæ, or sea-nettles. Spelled also Acalephe.

Acalephæ (a-ka-lē'fē), n. pl. [Gr. akalēphē, a nettle.] A name sometimes applied to a large number of marine animals included in the sub-kingdom Cœlenterata, and represented chiefly by the Medusidæ and their allies, in popular language known as sea-nettles, sea-blubbers, jelly-fish, &c. As a strictly scientific term, Acalephæ, however, is not now used, the forms once included under it being now distributed among the Discophora and Lucernarida (both in class Hydrozoa), and the Ctenophora (in class Actinozoa). The most typical of the Acalephæ, the Medusidæ, are gelatinous, free-swimming animals, consisting of an umbrella-shaped disc containing canals which radiate from the centre whence hangs the digestive cavity. All have thread cells or urticating organs (see NEMATOPHORE) which discharge minute barbed structures that irritate the skin like the sting of a nettle, hence the name of the group.

Acalephæ.

1, Medusa pellucens. 2, Rhizostoma Cuvieri.

Acaleph (a-ka-lē'foid), a. Like an acaleph or medusa. [Less commonly used than Medusoid.]

Acalycine, Acalycinous (a-kal'i-sin, ak-a-lis'in-us), a. [Gr. a, not, and kalyx, a cup.] In bot. without a calyx or flower-cup.

Acanaceous (ak-a-nā'shus), a. [Gr. akanos, a prickly shrub.] In bot. armed with prickles: said of some rigid prickly plants, such as the pine-apple.

Acantha (a-kan'tha), n. [Gr. akantha, a spine or thorn.] 1. In bot. a prickle.—2. In zool. a spine or prickly fin.—3. In anat. one of the acute processes of the vertebræ, the spine of the tibia, or the spina dorsi.

Acanthaceæ (ak-an-thā'sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of plants, having for its type the genus Acanthus. The species are common in all tropical countries, and consist of herbaceous plants or shrubs, with opposite leaves and monopetalous corolla. They have mucilaginous and bitter properties.

Acanthaceous (ak-an-thā'shus), a. Armed with prickles, as a plant; belonging to the order Acanthaceæ.

Acanthice (a-kan'this-ē), n. [Gr. akanthikē mastichē, the juice of a prickly plant that furnished a kind of mastic—akantha, a thorn.] The sweet juice of ivy buds.

Acanthichthyosis (ak-an-thik'thi-ō''sis), n. [Gr. akantha, a thorn, and ichthys, a fish.] In med. spinous fish-skin disease.

Acanthine (a-kan'thin), a. [See ACANTHUS.] Pertaining to or resembling the plant Acanthus; made of material derived from a prickly plant.

Acanthocephala, Acanthocephali (a-kan'-thō-sef''a-la, a-kan'thō-sef''a-lī), n. pl. [Gr. akantha, a spine, and kephalē, the head.] An order of mouthless Entozoa, having curved hooks on a retractile proboscis to attach themselves to the tissues of animals.

One species occurs in the liver of the cat, another in the alimentary canal of the swine. Other members of the group live in the bodies of fishes and birds. All of these animals are parasitic during their entire existence. The hooked processes of the proboscis are the means by which the animal adheres to the intestinal canal of its host.

Acanthodes (ak-an-thō'dēz), n. [Gr. akantha, a spine, and eidos, resemblance.] A genus of fossil fishes, from the carboniferous strata, with strong bony spines.

Acanthodidæ (ak-an-thō'di-dē), n. pl. A family of fossil fishes, including the genus Acanthodes (which see).

Acanthoid (a-kan'thoid), a. [Gr. akantha, a spine.] Spiny.

Acanthophis (a-kan'thō-fis), n. [Gr. akantha, a prickle, and ophis, a serpent.] A genus of venomous colubrine snakes, the species of which are of small size, reside on dry land, and feed upon frogs, lizards, and small mammals. They have the tail furnished with a horny spur at the end, whence the generic name. A. antarctica, the death-adder, an inhabitant of Australia, is considered the most venomous reptile of that country.

Acanthophorous (ak-an-tho'for-us), a. [Gr. akantha, a thorn, and phero, to bear.] Having or producing spines or prickles.

Acanthopteri (ak-an-thop'tėr-ī), n. pl. [Gr. akantha, a spine, and pteron, a wing.] A group of spine-finned osseous fishes, in modern classifications generally regarded as a sub-order of the order Teleostei, and equivalent to the Acanthopterygii (which see).

Acanthopterous (ak-an-thop'tėr-us), a. Of or pertaining to the Acanthopteri.

Acanthopterygian (a-kan'thop-te-rij''i-an), a. Of or pertaining to the Acanthopterygii.

Acanthopterygian (a-kan'thop-te-rij''i-an), n. An acanthopterygian fish.

Acanthopterygii (a-kan'thop-te-rij''i-ī), n. pl. [Gr. akantha, a thorn, and pterygion, the fin of a fish, from pteryx, a wing.] One of the two primary divisions of the osseous fishes established by Cuvier, now forming a group or sub-order of the order Teleostei, and including by far the greatest number of ordinary fishes. They are characterized by having one or more of the first rays of the fins in the form of unjointed spines. In some species the first dorsal fin is represented by a few unconnected spines. The first rays of the anal fins consist of simple spines, and each ventral fin has usually one. The swim-bladder is in all a shut sac. They include the perch, mackerel, gudgeon, weever, stickleback, basse, flying-fish, mullet, braize, tunny, &c. Many fishes belonging to this division are used as food.

Acanthopterygious (a-kan'thop-te-rij''-i-us), a. In zool. having the characters of the Acanthopterygii or spine-finned fishes; belonging to the Acanthopterygii.

Acanthoteuthis (a-kan'thō-tū''this), n. [Gr. akantha, a spine, and teuthis, a cuttle-fish.] A genus of fossil cuttle-fishes occurring in the oolite. The internal bone or osselet (belemnite) is the part most generally preserved.

Acanthous (a-kan'thus), a. [Gr. akantha, a spine.] Spinous.

Acanthurus (ak-an-thū'rus), n. [Gr. akantha, a spine, and oura, a tail.] A genus of acanthopterygious fishes, distinguished by their compressed shape and lancet-like spines placed on each side of the tail, popularly called surgeon or lancet fishes and thorn-tails.

Acanthus (a-kan'thus), n. [L. acanthus, Gr. akanthos, from akantha, a prickle or thorn. See ACACIA.] 1. The plant bear's-breech, or brankursine, a genus of prickly plants, nat. order Acanthaceæ.—2. In arch. an ornament resembling the foliage or leaves of the acanthus, used in capitals of the Corinthian and Composite orders, and said to have been invented by Callimachus, who took the idea of the Corinthian capital from observing an acanthus surrounding a tile-covered basket which had been placed over a tomb.

Acanthylis (a-kan'thi-lis), n. [Gr. akanthyllis, a kind of finch, dim. from akanthis, the siskin.] A genus of American, Indian, and Australian birds of the swallow family.

Acanticonite, Acanticone (a-kan'ti-kōn-īt, a-kan'ti-kōn), n. [Gr. akanthis, the siskin, and konis, powder, from the greenish colour of its powder.] A variety of prismatic epidote, an almost obsolete synonym of Pistacite. See EPIDOTE.

A capella (ä kä-pel'lä), adv. [It.] In the style of church or chapel music: applied to compositions sung without musical accompaniments; thus, mass a capella is a mass purely sung.

Acardia (a-kär'di-a), n. [Gr. a, priv., and kardia, the heart.] The state of being without a heart, as is the case with some fœtuses or monstrous births.

Acardiac (a-kär'di-ak), a. [Gr. a, priv., and kardia, the heart.] Without a heart.

Acardiac (a-kär'di-ak), n. A fœtus without a heart.

Acaricide (a-kär'i-sīd), n. A substance that destroys acari or mites.

Acarid (ak'a-rid), n. One of the Acarida.

Acarida (a-kar'i-da), n. pl. [Gr. akarēs, too short to be cut, small, tiny — a, priv., and keirō, to cut.] A division of Arachnida, including the mites, ticks, and water-mites. Of the true mites, the domestic or cheese mite and the itch-mite are examples. The garden-mites (Trombididæ) and spider-mites (Ganasidæ) live upon plants; the wood-mites (Oribatidæ) and harvest-ticks (Leptidæ) are found amongst moss and herbage, or creeping on trees and stones; while the true ticks (Ixodidæ) attach themselves parasitically to the bodies of various mammals, as sheep, oxen, dogs, &c. The water-mites (Hydrachnidæ) are parasitic for at least a portion of their existence upon water-beetles and other aquatic insects. The mouth in all is formed for suction, and there is no definite line of demarcation between the unsegmented abdomen and the cephalo-thorax. Also called Acaridæ, Acaridans, Acarina, and Monomerosomata.

Acarida.

1, Itch-mite (Sarcoptes scabiei). 2, Cheese-mite (Acarus domesticus). 3, Harvest-tick (Leptus autumnalis).

Acaridæ (a-kar'i-dē). See ACARIDA.

Acaridan (a-kar'i-dan), n. One of the Acarida.

Acarina (a-ka-rī'na). See ACARIDA.

Acarnar (a-kär'när), n. [Arab. ākhir-an-nahr, extremity of the river, An-nahr, the river, being the Arabic name of the constellation Eridanus.] A bright star of the first magnitude in the constellation Eridanus. Written also Achernar, Akharnar.

Acarpous (a-kär'pus), a. [Gr. akarpos, unfruitful — a, priv., and karpos, fruit.] In bot. not producing fruit; sterile; barren.

Acarus (ak'a-rus), n. pl. Acari (ak'a-rī). The typical genus of insects belonging to the Acarida, comprising the mites and ticks.

Acast † (a-kast'), a. An old sea-term for lost or cast away.

Acatalectic (a'kat-a-lek''tik), a. [Gr. akatalēktos, not defective at the end — a, priv., kata, down, and lēgō, to cease.] Not halting short; complete; having the complete number of syllables; as, an acatalectic verse.

Acatalectic (a'kat-a-lek''tik), n. A verse which has the complete number of syllables.

Acatalepsy (a-kat'a-lep-sī), n. [Gr. akatalēpsia, incomprehensibility—a, priv., kata, down, and lēpsis, a taking, from lab, lēp, root of lambanō, to take.] 1. Impossibility of complete discovery or comprehension; incomprehensibility; specifically, a term employed to denote the doctrine held by the ancient academics and sceptics, that human knowledge never amounts to certainty but only to probability. [Rare.]—2. In med. uncertainty in the diagnosis or prognosis of diseases.

Acataleptic (a'kat-a-lep''tik), a. Incomprehensible; not to be known with certainty.

Acataleptic (a'kat-a-lep''tik), n. One who believes that we can know nothing with certainty.

> All sceptics and Pyrrhonians were called acataleptics. Fleming.

Acater † (a-kāt'ėr), n. [Norm. and O.E. achatour, acatour, a purchaser. See CATERER.] A purveyor; a caterer. 'Robin Hood's bailiff or acater.' B. Jonson.

Acates † (a-kāts'), n. pl. [Lit. things bought; Fr. achat, a purchase. See ACATER.] Viands. 'Setting before him variety of acates, and those excellently dressed.' Shelton.

Acatharsia (a-ka-thär'si-a), n. [Gr.] In med. (a) the filth or sordes proceeding from a wound; impurity of blood. (b) Omission of a purgative.

Acatharsy (a-ka-thär'si), n. Same as Acatharsia.

Acathistus (ak-a-this'tus), n. [L.L.] In the early Greek Ch. a thanksgiving hymn to the Virgin sung at Constantinople on the Saturday of the fifth week of Lent.

Acatry † (a-kā'tri), n. [Lit. place for the acates. See ACATES, ACATER.] The room or place allotted to the keeping of all such provisions as the purveyors purchased for the king.

Acaules (a-kạ'lēz), n. pl. [A, priv., and L. caulis, a stem. See ACAULOUS.] Plants which have either a very indistinct stalk or none at all, as lichens, fungi, algæ, &c.

Acaulescent (a-kạ-les'ent), a. [Gr. a, priv., and kaulos, a stem.] In bot. stemless: a term applied to a plant in which the stem is apparently absent.

Acauline (a-kạ'līn), a. Same as Acaulous.

Acaulous, Acaulose (a-kạ'us, a-kạ'lōs), a. [Gr. a, priv., and kaulos, a stalk, the same word as L. caulis, a stem, and E. kole, kail, *cauli*flower.] In bot. without a conspicuous stem, called caulis, as the Carduus acaulis, or dwarf plume-thistle.

Accable, † v.t. [Fr. accabler, to overburden, to overwhelm.] To overwhelm; to oppress; to overburden.

> Honours rather raise men's spirits than accable them. Bacon.

Accapitum † (ak-kap'i-tum), n. [L. ad, to, and caput, capitis, the head.] In feudal law, money paid by a vassal upon his admission to a feud; the relief due to the chief lord.

Accedas ad curiam (ak-sē'das ad kū'ri-am), n. [L., that you go to the court.] In law, formerly a writ obtainable by one who had received false judgment (or believed so) in a court-baron or hundred-court, issued by the chancery, and directed to the sheriff, directing him to make record of the judgment and return it to the King's Bench or Common Pleas, that its validity in law might be inquired into.

Accede (ak-sēd'), v.i. pret. & pp. acceded; ppr. acceding. [Fr. accéder, to assent, from L. accedo—ad, to, and cedo, to move, to yield or give place.] 1. To agree or assent, as to a proposition, or to terms proposed by another; to become a party, by agreeing to the terms of a treaty or convention.

> This obvious reflection convinced me of the absurdity of the treaty of Hanover, in 1725, between France and England, to which the Dutch afterwards acceded. Chesterfield.

2. To join or be added.

> And vain were courage, learning; all,
> Till power accede. Shenstone.

3. To succeed, as an heir; to come to by inheritance; as, Queen Victoria acceded to the throne in 1837.—SYN. To agree, assent, consent, comply, acquiesce.

Accelerando (a-chāl'er-an''dō). [It.] In music, a direction indicating that a passage is to be played gradually quicker.

Accelerate (ak-sel'ėr-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. accelerated; ppr. accelerating. [L. accelero, acceleratum, to hasten—ad, to, and celer, swift. See CELERITY.] 1. To make quicker; to cause to move or advance faster; to hasten; to add to the velocity of; to give a higher rate of progress to; as, to accelerate motion or the rate of motion; to accelerate the transmission of intelligence; to accelerate the growth of a plant, or the progress of knowledge.

Take new beer and put in some quantity of stale beer into it, and see whether it will not accelerate the clarification. Bacon.

Lo! from the dread immensity of space
Returning with accelerated course
The rushing comet to the sun descends. Thomson.

2. To bring nearer in time; to bring about, or help to bring about, more speedily than would otherwise have been the case; as, to accelerate the ruin of a government; to accelerate a battle.—Accelerated motion, in mech. that which continually receives fresh accessions of velocity. If the accessions be always equal in equal times the motion is said to be uniformly accelerated, as that of a heavy body descending by gravity; but if the accessions of velocity in equal times either increase or decrease, the motion is said to be variably accelerated.—Accelerated force is the increased force which a body exerts in consequence of the acceleration of its motion.—Accelerating force is the force which produces an accelerated motion, as gravity.

Acceleration (ak'sel-ėr-ā''shon), n. The act of accelerating or state of being accelerated; as, (a) the act or process of increasing velocity or progress; the state of being quickened in motion or action. (b) The shortening of the time between the present and the happening of any future event; specifically, in law, the shortening of the time for the vesting in possession of an expectant interest. (c) In physiol. and pathol. increased activity of the functions, particularly of the circulating fluids.—Acceleration of the moon, the increase of the moon's mean angular velocity about the earth, the moon now moving rather faster than in ancient times. This phenomenon has not been fully explained, but it is known to be partly owing to the slow process of diminution which the eccentricity of the earth's orbit is undergoing, and from which there results a slight diminution of the sun's influence on the moon's motions.—Diurnal acceleration of the fixed stars, the apparent greater diurnal motion of the stars than of the sun, arising from the fact that the sun's apparent yearly motion takes place in a direction contrary to that of his apparent daily motion. The stars thus seem each day to anticipate the sun by nearly 3 minutes 56 seconds of mean time.—Acceleration of a planet, the greater rapidity with which it moves as it approaches the sun.—Acceleration and retardation of the tides, certain deviations between the time of the actual occurrence of high water at any place and what it would be if it occurred after the lapse of a uniform mean interval. In spring and neap tides the sun's action does not alter the time of high water, as in the former case the solar and lunar tides are synchronous, while in the latter the time of actual or lunar low water and of solar high water are the same. But in the first and third quarters of the moon there is acceleration or priming of high water, as the solar wave is to the west of the lunar; and in the second and fourth quarters there is retardation or lagging, for an analogous reason.

Accelerative (ak-sel'ėr-āt-iv), a. Tending to accelerate; adding to velocity; quickening progression.

Accelerator (ak-sel'ėr-āt-ėr), n. One who or that which accelerates; a hastener. Hence—(a) A post-office van. (b) In anat. a muscle which contracts to expel or accelerate the passage of the urine. (c) In photog. a name given to any substance which shortens the time of exposure either in the camera or the printing frame.

Acceleratory (ak-sel'ėr-ā-to-ri), a. Accelerating or tending to accelerate; quickening motion.

Accend † (ak-send'), v.t. [L. accendo, accensum, to kindle—ad, and candeo, to be white, to shine, from root can, as in canus, hoary, white; the same stem gives also E. candle, candid, &c.] To set on fire; to kindle.

Our devotion, if sufficiently accended, would burn up innumerable books of this sort. Dr. H. More.

Accendent (ak-sen'dent), n. An accensor (which see).

Accendibility (ak-send'i-bil''i-ti), n. The quality of being accendible.

Accendible (ak-send'i-bl), a. [See ACCEND.] Capable of being inflamed or kindled.

Accension (ak-sen'shon), n. The act of kindling or setting on fire, or the state of being kindled; inflammation.

Accensor (ak-sen'sėr), n. [See ACCEND.] One who sets on fire or kindles; specifically, in the R. Cath. Ch. a minister or servant whose business it is to light and trim the candles and tapers.

Accent (ak'sent), n. [L. accentus, an accent, —ad, to, and cano, cantum, to sing. See CHANT.] 1. A superior stress or force of voice upon certain syllables of words, which distinguishes them from the other syllables. Many English words, as as'pir-a''tion, have two accents, a secondary and primary. In uttering the word aspiration we observe the first and third syllables are distinguished—the third by a full sound, which constitutes the primary accent; the first, by a degree of force in the voice which is less than that of the primary accent, but evidently greater than that which falls on the second and fourth syllables. Some words, as in-com'pre-hen'si-bil''i-ty, have two secondary or subordinate accents. When the full accent falls on a vowel, that vowel has its long sound, as in vo'cal; but when it falls on an articulation or consonant, the preceding vowel is short, as in hab'it. Accent alone regulates English verse. Accent must not be confounded with emphasis, the latter being used in reference to some one word or part of a sentence to which a speaker wishes to draw attention, by giving it a more marked pronunciation. 2. A mark or character used in writing to direct the stress of the voice in pronunciation, or to mark a particular tone, length of vowel sound, or the like. There is commonly only one such sign used to mark the stress or accent in English, except in works on elocution, in which are employed the three Greek accents, namely the acute (ʹ), the grave (ˋ), and the circumflex (~ or ^). In elocution the first shows when the voice is to be raised, and is called the rising inflection; the second, when it is to be depressed, and is called the falling inflection; and the third, when the vowel is to be uttered with an undulating sound, and is called the compound or waving inflection.—3. A peculiar or characteristic modulation or modification of the voice, such as that found in a given district or in a particular rank of society, or as expressive of passions or sentiments; manner of speaking or pronouncing. 'A perfect accent.' Thackeray.

The tender accents of a woman's cry. Prior.

Your accent is something finer than you could purchase in so removed a dwelling. Shak.

4. Words, language, or expressions in general.

Winds, on your wings, to heaven her accents bear,
Such words as heaven alone is fit to hear. Dryden.

5. In music, a stress or emphasis given to certain notes or parts of bars in a composition, divided into two kinds—grammatical, and rhetorical or æsthetic. The first is perfectly regular in its occurrence, always falling on the first part of a bar; the æsthetic accent is irregular, and depends on taste and feeling.—6. In math. (a) in alg. a mark used in order to avoid the confusion arising from the use of many letters in an algebraical problem or a diagram, and also on other accounts. In this way the same letter or letters, being distinguished by accents, may be used to represent different magnitudes or quantities; thus abc and a'b'c' may stand for magnitudes as different in value as those represented by different letters. (b) In geom. and trigon. an accent at the right hand of a number indicating minutes of a degree; two accents, seconds, &c.; as, 20° 10′ 30″ = 20 degrees, 10 minutes, 30 seconds. (c) In mensur. and engin. a mark used to denote feet and inches; thus, 3′ 6″ = 3 feet, 6 inches.

Accent (ak-sent'), v.t. 1. To express the accent of; to pronounce or utter with a particular stress or modulation of the voice; as, to accent a word properly.—2. To give expression to; to utter.

Congeal'd with grief, can scarce implore
Strength to accent, Here my Albertus lies.
Dr. Wotton.

3. To mark with an accent or accents; as, to accent a word in order to indicate its pronunciation.—Accented parts of a bar, in music, those parts of the bar on which the stress falls, as the first and third parts of the bar in common time.

Accentor (ak-sent'ėr), n. [L. accentor, one who sings with—ad, to, and cano, to sing.] 1. In music, one that sings the leading part. 2. A genus of insessorial birds, family Sylviidæ, sub-family Accentorinæ. A. modularis is our well-known hedge-sparrow, hedge-warbler, shuffle-wing, or dunnock. See HEDGE-SPARROW.

Accentorinæ (ak-sen'tō-ri''nē), n. pl. A subfamily of dentirostral birds, of the order Insessores and family Sylviidæ, including the genus Accentor.

Accentual (ak-sent'ū-al), a. Pertaining to accent; rhythmical.

The term figurate which we now employ to distinguish florid from simple melody was used to denote that which was simply rhythmical or accentual. W. Mason.

Accentuate (ak-sent'ū-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. accentuated; ppr. accentuating. To mark or pronounce with an accent or with accents; to place an accent or accents on.

Accentuation (ak-sent'ū-ā''shon), n. The act of accentuating, or state of being accentuated; the act of pronouncing or marking with an accent or accents; the act of giving accent.

Accept (ak-sept'), v.t. [L. acceptare, freq. of accipio, acceptum, to take to one's self, to accept—ad, to, and capio, to take.] 1. To take or receive, as something offered; to receive with approbation or favour; as, he made an offer which was accepted.

If you accept them, then their worth is great. Shak.

Bless, Lord, his substance, and accept the work of his hands. Deut. xxxiii. 11.

2. To take what presents itself or what befalls one; to accommodate one's self to; as, to accept the situation.

They carry it off well, these fair moving mountains, and like all French women accept frankly their natural fortunes. Fraser's Magazine.

3. To listen favourably to; to grant.

Sweet prince, accept their suit. Shak.

4. To receive or admit and agree to; to accede or assent to; as, to accept a treaty, a proposal, an amendment, an excuse: often followed by of; as, accept of the terms.—5. To receive in a particular sense; to understand; as, how is this phrase to be accepted?—6. In com. to acknowledge, especially by signature, as calling for payment, and thus to promise to pay; as, to accept a bill of exchange.—7. In a deliberative body, to receive in discharge of a duty committed; as, the report was accepted.

Accept † (ak-sept'), n. Consent or acceptance.

We will suddenly
Pass our accept and peremptory answer. Shak.

Acceptable (ak-sep'ta-bl), a. Capable, worthy, or sure of being accepted or received with pleasure; hence, pleasing to a receiver; gratifying; agreeable; welcome; as, an acceptable present.

The woman whom thou mad'st to be my help
So fit, so acceptable, so divine. Milton.

Acceptableness, Acceptability (ak-sep'ta-bl-nes, ak-sep'ta-bil''i-ti), n. The quality of being acceptable or agreeable to a receiver, or to a person with whom one has intercourse

Acceptably (ak-sep'ta-bli), adv. In an acceptable manner; in a manner to please or give satisfaction.

Let us have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably. Heb. xii. 28.

Acceptance (ak-sep'tans), n. 1. The act of accepting: (a) the act of taking or receiving anything offered; receiving with approbation or satisfaction; favourable reception. 'Such with him finds no acceptance.' Milton.

They shall come up with acceptance on my altar. Is. lx. 7.

(b) The act of agreeing to terms or proposals, and thereby becoming bound; the act of taking some obligation on one's self; specifically, in law, an agreeing to the offer or contract of another by some act which binds the person in law; thus, if a person receiving an estate in remainder takes rent on a lease made by his predecessor, this is an acceptance of the terms of the lease, and binds the party receiving to abide by the terms of the lease; in com. an engagement by the person on whom a bill of exchange is drawn to pay the bill, usually made by the person writing the word 'accepted' across the bill and signing his name, or simply by writing his name across or at the end of the bill. Hence—2. A bill of exchange that has been accepted, or the sum contained in it.—3. † The sense in which a word or expression is understood; signification; meaning; acceptation. 'An assertion under the common acceptance of it not only false but odious.' South.—Acceptance with God, in theol. forgiveness of sins and reception into God's favour.

Acceptancy (ak-sep'tan-si), n. Act of accepting; acceptance.

Here's a proof of gift,
But here's no proof, sir, of acceptancy. E.B.Browning.

Acceptant (ak-sep'tant), n. One who accepts; an accepter. Spectator.

Acceptation (ak-sep-tā'shon), n. 1. The act of accepting or receiving; also, kind reception; a receiving with favour or approbation; a state of being acceptable; favourable regard. 'Coldness of acceptation.' Sir P. Sidney.

Some things are of great dignity and acceptation with God. Hooker.

This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation. 1 Tim. i. 15.

2. The meaning or sense in which a word or expression is understood or generally received; as, a term is to be used according to its usual acceptation.

My words in common acceptation
Could never give this provocation. Gay.

Accepted (ak-sept'ed), a. Acceptable.

Behold, now is the accepted time; behold, now is the day of salvation. 2 Cor. vi. 2.

Accepter, Acceptor (ak-sept'ėr, ak-sept'or), n. 1. A person who accepts; specifically, in com. the person who accepts a bill of exchange so as to bind himself to pay the sum contained in it.—2. † One who favours unduly; a respecter.

God is no accepter of persons, neither riches nor poverty are a means to procure his favour. Chillingworth.

Acceptilation † (ak-sep'ti-lā"shon), n. [L. acceptilatio, acceptilationis—acceptum, a receipt, and latio, a carrying, from fero, latum, to carry.] 1. In civil and Scots law, the verbal extinction of a verbal contract, with a declaration that the debt has been paid when it has not, or the acceptance of something merely imaginary in satisfaction of a verbal contract. Wharton. Hence—2. Free remission or forgiveness, as of sins.

Our justification which comes by Christ is by imputation and acceptilation, by grace and favour. Jer. Taylor.

Acception † (ak-sep'shon), n. 1. The received sense of a word; acceptation.

That this hath been esteemed the due and proper acception of this word, I shall testify. Hammond.

2. The act of favouring unequally; preference. 'Accepcioun of persons.' Wickliffe.

Acceptive † (ak-sep'tiv), a. Ready to accept.

The people generally are very acceptive and apt to applaud any meritable work. B. Jonson.

Acceptor. See ACCEPTER.

Acceptress (ak-sep'tres), n. A female who accepts. [Rare.]

Accerse † (ak-sėrs'), v.t. [L. accerso, to summon.] To call out or forth; to summon, as an army. Hall.

Access (ak'ses), n. [L. accessus, from accedo, to come near, to approach. See ACCEDE.] 1. A coming to; near approach; admittance; admission; as, to gain access to a prince.

I did repel his letters, and denied
His access to me. Shak.

2. The means or way by which a thing may be approached; specifically, in arch. a passage in a building communicating between two or more apartments; a corridor; as, the access is by a neck of land.

All access was thronged. Milton.

3. Admission to sexual intercourse.

During coverture access of the husband shall be presumed, unless the contrary be shown. Blackstone.

4. Addition; increase; accession.

I, from the influence of thy looks, receive access in every virtue. Milton.

5. The attack or return of a fit or paroxysm of disease, as of a fever; accession.

The first access looked like an apoplexy. Bp. Burnet.

Accessarily (ak'ses-sa-ri-li), adv. In the manner of an accessary; accessorily.

Accessariness (ak'ses-sa-ri-nes), n. State of being accessary; accessoriness.

Accessary (ak'ses-sa-ri), n. An accomplice; an accessory.

Accessary (ak'ses-sa-ri), a. 1. Additional; accessory.

Among many secondary and accessary causes that support monarchy, these are not of least reckoning. Milton.

2. Acceding or contributing to a crime; as, he was accessary to rebellion. See ACCESSORY.

Accessibility (ak'ses-si-bil"i-ti), n. The condition or quality of being accessible or of admitting approach.

Accessible (ak-ses'si-bl), a. Capable of being approached or reached; easy of access; approachable; attainable; as, an accessible town or mountain. 'Accessible by a bold and sudden attack.' Sir W. Scott. 'Most frankly accessible, most affable . . . most sociable.' Barrow. 'Proofs accessible to all the world.' Buckle.

There is a very great amount of labour employed in rendering the product accessible to those for whose use it is intended. J. S. Mill.

Accessibly (ak-ses'si-bli), adv. So as to be accessible.

Accession (ak-se'shon), n. [L. accessio. See ACCEDE.] 1. The act of acceding; the act of agreeing or assenting, as to proposals; the act of becoming joined, as to a party; as, his accession to my demands was long postponed; a king's accession to a confederacy. 2. Increase by something added; that which is added; augmentation; as, an accession of wealth or territory.

The only accession which the Roman Empire received was the province of Britain. Gibbon.

3. The act of arriving at a throne, an office, or dignity; as, the accession of Queen Victoria; the accession of the house of Stuart.

Nobody could pretend that the law had been altered since his (William's) accession. Macaulay.

4. In law, a mode of acquiring property, by which the owner of a corporeal substance, which receives an addition by growth or by labour, has a right to the thing added or the improvement, provided the thing is not changed into a different species. Thus the owner of a cow becomes the owner of her calf.—5. In med. the attack, approach, or commencement of a disease.—Deed of accession, in Scots law, a deed executed by the creditors of a bankrupt, by which they approve of a trust given by their debtor for the general behoof, and bind themselves to concur in the plans proposed for extricating his affairs.

Accessional (ak-se'shon-al), a. Additional. [Rare.]

The specific and accessional perfections which the human understanding derives from it. Coleridge.

Accessit (ak-ses'sit), n. [L., he came near.] In English universities, a term applied to a certificate for a person second in merit.

Accessive (ak-ses'iv), a. Additional. Hopkins.

Accessorial (ak-ses-sō'ri-al), a. Pertaining to an accessory; as, accessorial agency; accessorial guilt.

Accessorily (ak'ses-so-ri-li), adv. In the manner of an accessory; not as principal but as a subordinate agent.

Accessoriness (ak'ses-so-ri-nes), n. The state of being accessory, or of being or acting in a secondary character.

Accessory (ak'ses-so-ri), a. [L. accessorius, from accessus, accedo. See ACCEDE.] 1. [Of persons.] Acceding; contributing; aiding in producing some effect, or acting in subordination to the principal agent: usually in a bad sense; as, John was accessory to the felony.—2. [Of things.] Contributing to a general effect; aiding in certain acts or effects in a secondary manner; belonging to something else as principal; accompanying; as, accessory sounds in music; accessory muscles.—Accessory valves, in zool. small additional valves, as those placed near the umbones of the genus Pholas among Mollusca.—Accessory action, in Scots law, an action in some degree subservient or ancillary to another action.—Accessory obligation, in Scots law, an obligation annexed to another obligation. Thus, an obligation for the regular payment of interest is accessory to the obligation to pay the capital.

Accessory (ak'ses-so-ri), n. 1. In law, one who is guilty of a felony, not by committing the offence in person or as principal, but by being in some way concerned therein, as by advising or commanding another to commit the crime, or by concealing the offender, or in any way helping him to escape punishment. An accessory before the fact is one who counsels or commands another to commit a felony, and is not present when the act is executed; after the fact, when one receives and conceals, or in any way assists, the offender, knowing him to have committed a felony. In treason there are no accessories, all implicated being treated as principals. See ABETTER.—2. That which accedes or belongs to something else, as its principal; something that contributes to an effect; an accompaniment. 'The aspect and accessories of a den of banditti.' Carlyle. Specifically, in the fine arts, a secondary object introduced as illustrative or explanatory of the scene, or contributing to the general effect and harmony of the piece; generally, anything introduced into a work which is not absolutely necessary. Vases, columns, armour, &c., in historical paintings and portraits, are accessories.—SYN. Accomplice, abettor, assistant, coadjutor, ally.

Acciaccatura (at'chäk-kä-tö"rä), n. [It.] In music, a grace-note one semitone below the note to which it is prefixed.

Accidence (ak'si-dens), n. [A corruption of accidents. See ACCIDENT, 4.] That part of grammar which treats of the accidents or inflection of words; a small book containing the rudiments of grammar.

I do confess I do want eloquence,
And never yet did learn mine accidence.
John Taylor.

Accident (ak'si-dent), n. [L. accidens, falling—ad, and cado, to fall, whence case, cadence, casual, decadence, &c.] 1. Chance or what happens by chance; an event which proceeds from an unknown cause, or is an unusual effect of a known cause, and therefore not expected: often in the sense of an unforeseen and undesigned injury to human life or limb; casualty; mishap: in second extract equivalent to specimen of an injury.

All of them, in his opinion, owe their being to fate, accident, or the blind action of stupid matter. Dwight.

2. Anything which takes place or begins to exist without an efficient intelligent cause and without design. 'The accident of an accident.' Lord Thurlow.

In his (the atheist's) eyes the universe . . . is but a happily ordered accident. Dr. T. Brown.

3. In logic, a property or quality of a thing which is not essential to it, nor is one of its invariable signs; a predicable which may be present or not, the essence of the species remaining the same; as, whiteness in paper. All qualities are called accidents, in opposition to substances, as sweetness, softness, &c. 4. † In gram. something belonging to a word, but not essential to it, as gender, number, and case. See ACCIDENCE.—5. In her. a point or mark, not essential to a coat of arms.—SYN. Chance, contingency, casualty, misfortune.

Accidental (ak-si-dent'al), a. 1. Happening by chance or accident, or unexpectedly; taking place not according to the usual course of things; casual; fortuitous; opposed to constant, regular, or intended; as, an accidental visit.—2. Non-essential; not necessarily belonging; adventitious; as, songs are accidental to a play.—Accidental colours, in optics, the imaginary complementary colours seen after fixing the eye for a short time on a bright-coloured object, and then turning it suddenly to a white or light-coloured surface. If the object is blue, the accidental colour is yellow; if red, green; thus, if we look fixedly at a red wafer on a piece of paper, and then turn the eye to another part of the paper, a green spot is seen.—Accidental lights, in painting, secondary lights which are not accounted for by the prevalent effect; effects of light other than ordinary daylight, such as the rays of the sun darting through a cloud, or between the leaves of a thicket of trees, or the effects of moonlight, candle-light, or burning bodies.—Accidental point, in persp. that point in which a right line drawn from the eye parallel to another given right line, cuts the picture or plane. Thus, suppose AB to be the line given in perspective, CFE the perspective plane, D the eye, CD the line parallel to AB; then is C the accidental point.—Accidental, Casual, Fortuitous, Contingent, Incidental. Accidental is applied to what falls out, as it were, by chance, and not in the regular course of events. Casual is applied to such occurrences as, coming by chance, have no immediate consequences beyond themselves: it is the accidental combined with the unimportant. Fortuitous (almost equal to accidental) is applied to what occurs without any known cause, and in opposition to what has been foreseen. A thing is contingent when it is such that, considered in itself, it may or may not happen, but is dependent for its happening on something else. Incidental is applied to what falls into some regular course of things, but forms no essential part thereof.

Accidental Point.

This is accidental to a state of religion, and therefore ought to be reckoned among the ordinary difficulties of it. Tillotson.

These are casual breaks in the general system. W. Irving.

As chance is the operator assigned in a fortuitous concourse of atoms, we would know what this chance, this wise and ingenious artist, is. Henry Brooke.

With an infinite being nothing can be contingent. Paley.

By some persons religious duties appear to be regarded as an incidental business. Dr. J. Rogers.

Accidental (ak-si-dent'al), n. Anything happening, occurring, or appearing accidentally, or as if accidentally; a casualty; a property not essential. [Rare.]

He conceived it just that accidentals . . . should sink with the substance of the accusation. Fuller.

Conceive, as much as you can, of the essentials of any subject, before you consider its accidentals. Watts.

Specifically, (a) in music, a sharp, flat, or natural which does not occur in the clef, and which implies some change of key or modulation different from that in which the piece began. (b) In her. an additional mark in a coat of arms not essential to its character. (c) In med. texture resulting from morbid action: chiefly employed in this sense by French writers, but adopted by some English. (d) In painting, one of those fortuitous or chance effects, occurring from luminous rays falling on certain objects, by which they are brought into stronger light than they otherwise would be, and their shadows are consequently of greater intensity.

Accidentalism (ak-si-dent'al-izm), n. 1. The condition or quality of being accidental; accidental character.—2. That which is accidental; accidental effect; specifically, in painting, the effect produced by accidental rays of light. Ruskin. See ACCIDENTAL, n. (d).

Accidentality (ak'si-den-tal"i-ti), n. The quality of being accidental; accidental character.

I wish in short to connect by a moral copula natural history with political history, or, in other words, to make history scientific, and science historical—to take from history its accidentality, and from science its fatalism. Coleridge.

Accidentally (ak-si-dent'al-li), adv. In an accidental manner; by chance; casually; fortuitously; not essentially.

I conclude choler accidentally bitter and acrimonious, but not in itself. Harvey.

Accidentalness (ak-si-dent'al-nes), n. The quality of being accidental.

Accidentary† (ak-si-dent'a-ri), a. Accidental. Holland.

Accidentiary† (ak-si-den'shi-a-ri), a. Pertaining to or learning the accidence.

You know the word 'sacerdotes' to signify priests, and not the lay-people, which every accidentiary boy in schools knoweth as well as you. Bp. Morton.

Accidie,† n. [L. accidia, acedia, sloth, from Gr. akēdia, ease, indifference, and in ecclesiastical Greek, sloth.] Sloth; negligence; indolence. Chaucer.

Accipenser. [Erroneous spelling.] Same as Acipenser.

Accipient† (ak-sip'i-ent), n. [L. accipiens, accipientis, ppr. of accipio. See ACCEPT.] A receiver.

Accipiter (ak-sip'i-tėr), n. [L. accipiter, a bird of prey, not from accipio, to receive, to take, but from root ak, signifying sharpness and swiftness, and pet, to fly, like Gr. ōkypteros, swift-winged.] 1. One of the order of birds Accipitres or Raptores. See RAPTORES.—2. In surg. a bandage applied over the nose: so called from its resemblance to the claw of a hawk.

Accipitrary† (ak-sip'i-tra-ri), n. A falconer. Nash.

Accipitres (ak-sip'i-trēz), n. pl. [See ACCIPITER.] The name given by Linnæus and Cuvier to the rapacious birds, now usually called Raptores (which see).

Accipitrinæ (ak-sip'i-trī"nē), n. pl. The hawks, a sub-family of raptorial birds, family Falconidæ, with the wings shorter than the tail, and the bill short and hooked from the base. They pounce on their prey when flying, and mostly inhabit cold climates.

Accipitrine (ak-sip'i-trin), a. [See ACCIPITER.] Of or pertaining to the Accipitres or raptorial birds; seizing; rapacious; as, the accipitrine order of birds.

Accismus (ak-sis'mus), n. [L., from Gr. akkismos, coyness, affectation.] In rhet. a feigned refusal; an ironical dissimulation. Smart.

Accite† (ak-sīt'), v.t. [L. ad, and cito, freq. of cieo, citum, to call. See CITE.] 1. To call; to cite; to summon.

He by the senate is accited home. Shak.

2. To incite; to prompt; to move.

What accites your thoughts to think so? Shak.

[In this example perhaps a misprint for excite.]

Acclaim (ak-klām'), v.t. [L. acclamo—ac for ad, and clamo, to cry out, whence claim, clamour, &c.] 1. To applaud. [Rare.]

How gladly did they spend their breath in acclaiming thee. Bp. Hall.

2. To declare or salute by acclamation.

While the shouting crowd
Acclaims thee king of traitors. Smollett.

Acclaim (ak-klām'), v.i. To applaud.

Acclaim (ak-klām'), n. A shout of joy; acclamation.

The vaulted firmament
With loud acclaims, and vast applause is rent. Dryden.

Acclamate† (ak'kla-māt), v.t. [L. acclamo, acclamatum. See ACCLAIM.] To applaud. Waterhouse.

Acclamation (ak-kla-mā'shon), n. [L. acclamatio. See ACCLAIM.] 1. A shout or other demonstration of applause made by a multitude, indicating joy, hearty assent, approbation, or good wishes. Acclamations are expressed by hurrahs, by clapping of hands, and often by repeating such cries as Long live the queen! Vive l'empereur! Vive la république! &c.

Those Presbyterian members of the House of Commons who had been expelled by the army, returned to their seats, and were hailed with acclamations by great multitudes. Macaulay.

When they (the Anglo-Saxons) consented to anything it was rather in the way of acclamation than by the exercise of a deliberate voice. Burke.

2. In archæol. a representation in sculpture or on medals of people expressing joy.

Acclamatory (ak-klam'a-to-ri), a. Expressing joy or applause by acclamation.

Acclimatation (ak-klī'ma-tā"shon), n. [Fr.] Acclimatization (which see). 'The Acclimatation Society of Nantes.' Times newspaper.

Acclimate (ak-klī'māt), v.t. pret. & pp. acclimated; ppr. acclimating. [Fr. acclimater, to acclimate. See CLIMATE.] To habituate to a foreign climate; to render proof against the prejudicial influences of a foreign climate; to acclimatize: more especially applied to the adaptation of human beings to new climates; as, to acclimate settlers; to acclimate one's self. 'Natives and acclimated Europeans.' J. Crawfurd.

Acclimatement (ak-klī'māt-ment), n. Acclimation. [Rare.]

Acclimation (ak'klī-mā"shon), n. The process of acclimating, or state of being acclimated; acclimatization.

Acclimatization (ak'klī-mat-iz-ā"shon), n. The act or process of acclimatizing, or state of being acclimatized; the modification of physical constitution which enables a race or individual to live in health in a foreign country. [Some writers use this word only with regard to animals and plants, using acclimation when speaking of man.]

Acclimatize, Acclimatise (ak-klī'mat-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. acclimatized; ppr. acclimatizing. To accustom or habituate to a foreign climate; to adapt for existence in a foreign climate, especially to adapt a race or stock for permanent existence and propagation; as, to acclimatize plants; to acclimatize animals. 'Young soldiers, not yet acclimatized, die rapidly here.' Times newspaper.

Accresce (ak-kres'), v.i. [L. accresco, accretum, to increase, to grow to—ad, to, and cresco, to grow, increase.] To accrue (which see).

Accrescence (ak-kres'sens), n. Act of increasing; gradual growth or increase; accretion.

The silent accrescence of belief from the unwatched depositions of a general, never contradicted hearsay. Coleridge.

Accrescent (ak-kres'sent), a. [L. accrescens, accrescentis, ppr. of accresco. See ACCRESCE.] Increasing; growing; specifically, in bot. applied to the parts of the calyx or corolla which grow larger after flowering.

Accrete (ak-krēt'), v.i. [See ACCRESCE.] 1. To grow by accretion; to gather additions from without. [Rare.]—2. To be added to; to accrue. [Rare.]

The House (of Commons), representing every class, would be stronger, more dignified, better fitted to exercise that vast, that almost excessive power, as sovereign senate, which is day by day accreting to it more rapidly. Spectator newspaper.

Accrete (ak-krēt'), a. In bot. grown together.

Accretion (ak-krē'shon), n. [L. accretio, accretionis, increase, from accresco, accretum. See ACCRESCE.] 1. The act of accreting or accrescing; a growing to; an increase by natural growth; an addition; specifically, an increase by an accession of parts externally.

A mineral or unorganized body can undergo no change save by the operation of mechanical or chemical forces; and any increase of its bulk is due to the addition of like particles to its exterior: it augments not by growth but by accretion. Owen.

2. In med. the growing together of parts naturally separate, as the fingers or toes.—3. The thing added; an accession: commonly used in the plural, and restricted to those accessions made slowly and gradually by some external force.

As careful peasants with incessant toil,
Bring earth to vines in bare and rocky soil,
So those accretions to the mind will bring,
Whence fond regard and just esteem will spring.
Crabbe.

4. In law, the adhering of property to something else, by which the owner of one thing becomes possessed of a right to another: generally applied to the increase which sometimes takes place on land situated on the bank of a river or the sea. When the accretion is by small and imperceptible degrees it belongs to the owner of the land immediately behind, but if it is sudden and considerable it belongs to the crown. In Scots law, the term is applied to the rendering any right, originally defective or imperfect, complete, by some posterior act on the part of him from whom the right is derived. Thus, where one not infeft conveys land, giving a precept of infeftment which is acted on, the subsequent infeftment of the seller renders valid the prior infeftment of the purchaser.

Accretive (ak-krēt'iv), a. Of or pertaining to accretion; increasing by growth; growing; adding to by growth. 'The accretive motion of plants.' Glanville.

Accriminate† (ak-krim'in-āt), v.t. [L. ad, to, and criminor, criminatus, to accuse of crime, from crimen, a crime.] To charge with a crime.

Accrimination (ak-krim'in-ā"shon), n. Accusation. [Rare.]

Accroach† (ak-krōch'), v.i. [Fr. accrocher, to fix on a hook, from croc, crochet, a hook, from a root both Teutonic and Celtic See CROOK.] 1. To hook, or draw to one's self, as with a hook.—2. In old laws, to assume the exercise of royal prerogatives.

Accroachment† (ak-krōch'ment), n. Act of accroaching; an attempt to assume the royal prerogative; an encroachment.

Accrue (ak-krö'), v.i. pret. & pp. accrued; ppr. accruing. [Fr. acorue, n. increase, accrû, pp. of accroître, to increase; O.Fr. accroistre, acrestre, acresser; Pr. acreisser, from L. accrescere, to increase, from ac for ad, to, and cresco, to grow, seen also in crescent, decrease, increase.] 1.† To grow; to increase; to augment.

And though power failed, her courage did accrue. Spenser.

2. To be added, as increase, profit, or damage; to be gained or obtained; to proceed or spring; as, a profit accrues to government from the coinage of copper; a loss accrues from the coinage of gold and silver.—Accruing costs, in law, expenses incurred after judgment.

Accrue† (ak-krö'), n. Something that accedes to or follows the property of another.

Accubation (ak-kū-bā'shon), n. [L. accubatio, accubationis, a reclining, from accubo, to recline—ad, to, and cubo, to lie down, from root cub or cumb, as in accumb, succumb, recumbent, &c.] A lying or reclining on a couch, as practised by the ancients at meals, the parties placing themselves with the head resting on a pillow or on the elbow, and the feet of one extended behind the back of another. 'Which gesture . . . cannot be avoided in the laws of accubation.' Sir T. Browne.

Accumb† (ak-kumbʹ), v.i. [L. accumbo, to lie down—ad, to, and cumbo, a nasalized form of cubo, to lie down. See ACCUBATION.] To recline, as at table. Bailey.

Accumbency (ak-kum'ben-si), n. State of being accumbent or reclining.

Accumbent (ak-kum'bent), a. [L. accumbens, ppr. of accumbo, from cubo. See ACCUBATION.] 1. Leaning or reclining, as the ancients at their meals.

The Roman recumbent, or more properly accumbent posture in eating was introduced after the first Punic war. Arbuthnot.

2. In bot. lying against anything: used in opposition to incumbent, or lying upon something; as, accumbent cotyledons.

Accumbent Ovule (Thlaspi arvense).

Accumbent† (ak-kum'bent), n. One who reclines, as at meals; one placed at a dinner-table.

A penance must be done by every accumbent in sitting out the passage through all these dishes. Bp. Hall.

Accumbing† (ak-kum'bing), a. Fitted or intended for accubation. 'Accumbing places.' Sir T. Browne.

Accumulate (ak-kū'mū-lāt), v.t. pret. & pp. accumulated; ppr. accumulating. [L. accumulo, accumulatum, to heap up—ad, to, and cumulus, a heap. See CUMULATE.] To heap up; to pile; to amass; to collect or bring together; as, to accumulate earth or stones; to accumulate causes of misery; to accumulate wealth.

In the seventeenth century a statesman who was at the head of affairs might easily, and without giving scandal, accumulate in no long time an estate amply sufficient to support a dukedom. Macaulay.

SYN. To collect, pile up, amass, gather, aggregate, heap together.

Accumulate (ak-kū'mū-lāt), v.i. To grow to a great size, number, or quantity; to increase greatly; as, public evils accumulate.

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.
Goldsmith.

Accumulate† (ak-kū'mū-lāt), a. Collected into a mass or quantity; increased; intensified. 'A more accumulate degree of felicity.' South.

Accumulation (ak-kū'mū-lā"shon), n. 1. The act of accumulating; the state of being accumulated; an amassing; a collecting together.

It is essential to the idea of wealth to be susceptible of accumulation; things which cannot, after being produced, be kept for some time before being used are never, I think, regarded as wealth. J. S. Mill.

Specifically, in law, the concurrence of several titles to the same thing, or of several circumstances to the same proof.—2. That which is accumulated; as, a great accumulation of sand at the mouth of a river.—Accumulation of degrees, in universities, the taking of several degrees together, or at smaller intervals than usual, or than is generally allowed by the rules.—Accumulation of power, a term applied to that amount of force or capacity for motion which exists in some machines at the end of intervals of time, during which the velocity of the moving body has been constantly accelerated.

3. Harshness or severity of temper.

Talents for criticism, namely, smartness, quick censure, vivacity of remark, indeed all but acerbity, seem rather the gifts of youth than of old age. Pope.

Aceric (as-ser'ik), a. [L. acer, a maple-tree.] Pertaining to the maple; obtained from the maple.—Aceric acid, an acid found in the juice of the Acer campestre or common maple.

Acerina (as-ér-ī'na), n. A genus of acanthopterygious fishes, family Percidæ or perches. The ruffe or pope (A. cernua), common in many English rivers, is a type of the genus.

Acerous, Acerose (as'ér-us, as'ér-ōz), a. [L. acerosus, chaffy, from acus, aceris, chaff. The second meaning comes rather from acus, a needle.] In bot. (a) chaffy; resembling chaff. (b) Narrow and slender, with a sharp point; as, an acerous or acerose leaf, which is one like that of the pine or common juniper.

Acertained† (a-sér'tānd), a. [O.Fr. acertainer, acertener. See ASCERTAIN and CERTAIN.] Made certain; confirmed in opinion.

Acerval (a-sérv'al), a. Pertaining to a heap. [Rare.]

Acervate (a-sérv'āt), v.t. [L. acervo, to heap up, from acervus, a heap.] To heap up. [Rare.]

Acervate (a-sérv'āt), a. In bot. heaped, or growing in heaps, or in closely-compacted clusters.

Acervation (as-ér-vā'shon), n. The act of heaping together. Johnson.

Acervose† (a-sérv'ōs), a. Full of heaps. Bailey.

Acescence (a-ses'ens), n. Acescency.

Acescency (a-ses'en-si), n. The act or process of becoming acescent; the process of becoming sour, tart, or acid; the state or quality of being moderately sour; sourness.

Nurses should never give suck after fasting; the milk having an acescency very prejudicial to the . . . recipient. W. Jones.

Acescent (a-ses'ent), a. [L. acescens, turning sour, from acesco, incept. of aceo, to be sour. See ACID.] Turning sour; becoming tart or acid by spontaneous decomposition, as vegetable or animal juices or infusions. Hence, slightly sour; acidulous; subacid.

Acetable† (a'set-a-bl), n. An acetabulum; a measure of about one-eighth of a pint. Holland.

Acetabulifera (as-ē-tab'ū-lif''ér-a), n. pl. [L. acetabulum, a sucker, and fero, to bear.] A section or order of cephalopodous mollusca, with rows of little cups or suckers on their arms or tentacles. Same as Dibranchiata.

Acetabuliferous (as-ē-tab'ū-lif''ér-us), a. Pertaining to the Acetabulifera; having rows of cup-like suckers, like the cuttle-fish. Dana.

Acetabuliform (as'ē-ta-bū''li-form), a. In bot. cup-shaped. Gray.

Acetabulum (as-ē-tab'ū-lum), n. [L., from acetum, vinegar. See ACID.] 1. In Rom. antiq. a vessel in which sauce was served to table, and not unlike our vinegar cruets; also, a measure about one-eighth of a pint. 2. In compar. anat. (a) the cavity of a bone for receiving the protuberant end of another bone, the two together forming the articulation called enarthrosis; especially the cavity of the os innominatum, which receives the head of the thigh-bone. (b) A term applied to the cotyledons or lobes of the placenta of ruminating animals. (c) In insects, the socket of the trunk in which the leg is inserted. (d) The cup-like sucker with which the arms of the cuttle-fish and other molluscs are provided.—3. In bot. (a) the cup- or saucer-like fructification of many lichens. (b) The receptacle of certain fungi.—4. In music, a very ancient kind of kettle-drum.

Acetal (a-sē'tal), n. ($C_6H_{14}O_2$.) A colourless, mobile liquid, with an agreeable odour, produced by the imperfect oxidation of alcohol, under the influence of platinum black. Slow combustion converts it into acetic acid.

Acetamide (a-set'a-mid), n. ($N H_2C_2H_3O$.) A white crystalline solid, produced by distilling ammonium acetate, or by heating ethyl acetate with strong aqueous ammonia. It acts both as a base and an acid, combining on the one hand with hydrochloric acid, and on the other forming salts by the replacement of one of its hydrogen atoms by metals.

Acetarious (as-ē-tā'ri-us), a. A term applied to plants containing acetary; more appropriately to plants used in making salads; such as lettuce, mustard and cress, endive, &c.

Acetary (as'ē-ta-ri), n. [L. acetaria, herbs eaten raw with vinegar and oil, from acetum, vinegar. See ACID.] An acid pulpy substance in certain fruits, as the pear.

Acetate (as'ē-tāt), n. A salt formed by the union of acetic acid with a base.

Acetated (as'ē-tāt-ed), a. Combined with acetic acid.

Acetic (a-set'ik), a. [L. acetum, vinegar.] Having the properties of vinegar; sour.—Acetic acid ($C_2H_4O_2$), an acid prepared by the oxidation of alcohol (acetous fermentation), the dry distillation of wood (in which case it is called pyroligneous acid), by decomposing an acetate, &c. It has a peculiar sharp smell and strong acid taste. It exists in vinegar in a dilute and impure form. In its pure state it is, at ordinary winter temperatures, a crystalline solid, and is known as glacial or crystalline acetic acid.—Acetic ethers, compounds consisting of acetates of alcohol radicals. Common acetic ether is a colourless, apple-flavoured, volatile fluid, and is a flavouring constituent in many wines. It is made artificially by distilling a mixture of alcohol, oil of vitriol, and acetate of potash.

Acetification (a-set'i-fi-kā''shon), n. The act of acetifying or making acetous or sour; the process of becoming acetous; the operation of making vinegar.—Chemical acetification, or the conversion of wine, beer, cider, and alcoholic fluids into acetic acid, is now supposed to be due to a minute mycoderma, a special vegetable organized being of the very simplest form, possessed of the power of almost inconceivably rapid development, as well as of fixing the oxygen of the air and transmitting it to the alcohol, thus establishing incomplete combustion.

Acetifier (a-set'i-fī-ér), n. An apparatus for hastening the acidification of fermented liquors by exposing a large surface to the air, used in making vinegar.

Acetify (a-set'i-fī), v.t. pret. & pp. acetified; ppr. acetifying. [L. acetum, vinegar, and facio, to make.] To convert into acid or vinegar.

Acetify (a-set'i-fī), v.i. To become acid; to be converted into vinegar.

Acetimeter, Acetometer (as-et-im'et-ér, as-et-om'et-ér), n. [L. acetum, vinegar, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the strength or purity of acids; an acidimeter.

Acetimetry (as-et-im'et-ri), n. The act or method of ascertaining the strength or purity of acids.

Acetone (as'et-ōn), n. 1. A limpid mobile liquid (C_3H_6O), with an agreeable odour and a strong peppermint-like taste, produced by the destructive distillation of acetates.—2. The general name for a class of compounds which may be regarded as built up of an acid and alcoholic radical.

Acetopathy (as-et-op'a-thi), n. [L. acetum, vinegar, and Gr. pathos, suffering.] A method of treating ailments by applying dilute acetic acid to the surface of the body above the spine and the parts affected.

Acetosity† (as-et-os'i-ti), n. The state or quality of being acetous or sour; sourness; tartness.

Acetous, Acetose (a-sē'tus, as-et-ōs'), a. [L. acetum, vinegar.] 1. Having a sour taste; acid. 'An acetous spirit.' Boyle.—2. Causing or connected with acetification; as, acetous fermentation.—Acetous fermentation, the process by which alcoholic liquids, as beer or wine, yield acetic acid by oxidation. See under ACETIFICATION.—Acetous acid, a term formerly applied to impure and dilute acetic acid, under the notion that it was composed of carbon and hydrogen in the same proportions as in acetic acid, but with less oxygen. It is now known that no such acid exists, so that this term is not now in use.

Acetum (a-sē'tum), n. [L., from aceo, to be sour. See ACID.] Vinegar (which see).

Acetyle (as'ē-til), n. (C_2H_3O.) A hypothetical radical supposed to exist in acetic acid and its derivatives. Aldehyde may be regarded as the hydride, and acetic acid as the hydrate of acetyle.

Ach,† Ache† (āch), n. [Fr. ache, from L. apium, parsley, from apis, a bee, bees being fond of parsley.] A kind of parsley. Holland.

Achæan, Achaian (a-kē'an, a-kā'an), n. and a. See ACHEAN.

Achate,† n. [Fr. acheter, O.Fr. achater, achapter, to purchase, from L.L. accaptare, to acquire, from L. ac for ad, to, and captare, to snatch at, to strive to get, intens. of capio, to take.] 1. Purchase; contract; bargain. Chaucer.—2. A thing purchased; specifically, in pl. provisions: in this sense written also Acates.

The kitchen clerke, that hight Digestion,
Did order all th' achates in seemly wise. Spenser.

Achatina (a-ka-tī'na), n. [L. achates, an agate.] A genus of pulmonate gasteropodous Mollusca, family Helicidæ, which feed on trees and shrubs in warm climates, such as Africa and the West Indies. Agate-snails is a name by which they are popularly known. Some of them have shells which are among the largest of land shells. Two small species, A. acicula and A. octina, are found in England.

Achatour,† n. [Norm. Fr., a purchaser. See ACHATE, CATERER.] A purchaser; a purveyor; a caterer. Written also Acater.

A gentil mauncipie was ther of a temple,
Of which achatours mighten take exemple
For to be wys in beyyng vitaille. Chaucer.

Ache (āk), n. [A. Sax. ace, æce, ece, ache, pain; acan, to ache; O.E. ake, ache, hache, eche; conjectured to be from natural cry expressive of pain or grief; comp. G. ach, pain; interj. ach! Dan. ak! ah! Gr. achos, pain.] Pain, or continued pain, in opposition to sudden twinges, or spasmodic pain; a continued gnawing pain as in toothache or earache. Both verb and noun were formerly often pronounced, down at least to the time of Swift, with ch sounded as in church; though the old spelling ake sufficiently shows that the other pronunciation must also have been used. In the following couplet ache is made to rhyme with patch:—

Or Gellia wore a velvet mastic patch
Upon her temples when no tooth did ache.
Ep. Hall.

Thus pronounced, the plural of the noun and similar forms of the verb were dissyllabic.

A coming shower your shooting corns presage
Old aches throb, your hollow tooth will rage.
Swift.

This pronunciation was used, on the stage at least, even in the present century, being required by the metre in such passages as the following.

I'll rack thee with old cramps;
Fill all thy bones with aches; make thee roar.
Shak.

Ache (āk), v.i. [See the noun.] To suffer pain; to have or be in pain, or in continued pain; to be distressed. 'The sense aches at thee.' Shak. See under noun.

Achean (a-kē'an), a. Pertaining to Achaia in Greece, and a celebrated league or confederacy established there. This state lay on the Gulf of Corinth, within Peloponnesus. Written also Achœan, Achaian.

Achean (a-kē'an), n. A native or inhabitant of Achaia.

Acheenese (ach'ēn-ēz), a. Pertaining to Acheen in the island of Sumatra.

Acheenese (ach'ēn-ēz), n. sing. and pl. A native or inhabitant of Acheen.

Acheilary (a-kī'la-ri), a. [Gr. a, priv., and cheilos, the lip.] Without a lip; specifically, in bot. a term denoting the absence of the labellum or lip in monstrous flowers of Orchidaceæ.

Acheked,† pp. Choked. Chaucer.

Achelor,† Ashlar.

Achene, Achenium (a-kēn', a-kē'ni-um), n. [Gr. a, priv., and chainō, to yawn, to gape.] In bot. a small dry carpel, containing a single seed, which does not open or dehisce when ripe. It is exemplified in the common buttercup and other members of the nat. order Ranunculaceæ, as well as in the orders Boraginaceæ, Compositæ, &c.

Achene—Lettuce and Ranunculus.

Achernar (a-kėr'när), n. Same as Acarnar.

Acherontia (ak-ėr-on'shi-a), n. A genus of nocturnal lepidopterous insects, family Sphingidæ. A. atropos is the death's-head moth, or death's-head hawk-moth. See under DEATH'S-HEAD.

Acherset (ak'ėr-set), n. An ancient measure of corn, supposed to be about 8 bushels.

Acheta (ak'e-ta), n. [L. acheta, the male cicada, Dor. achetas, lit. the chirper, from Gr. ēcheō, to sound.] A generic name sometimes used as equivalent to Gryllus. See GRYLLIDÆ.

Achetidæ (a-ket'i-dē), n. pl. [Acheta, and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] A name given by some naturalists to the Gryllidæ, or cricket family. See GRYLLIDÆ.

Ache-weed (āk'wēd), n. See GOUTWORT.

Achia, Achiar (a'cha, ach'ār), n. An Indian name for the pickled shoots of the young bamboo (Bambusa arundinacea), used as a condiment.

Achievable (a-chēv'a-bl), a. [See ACHIEVE.] Capable of being achieved or performed.

To raise a dead man to life doth not involve contradiction, and is therefore, at least, achievable by Omnipotence. Barrow.

Achievance (a-chēv'ans), n. Performance; achievement. 'His noble acts and achievances.' Sir T. Elyot. [Rare.]

Achieve (a-chēv'), v.t. pret. & pp. achieved; ppr. achieving. [Fr. achever, to finish, to bring to end, from prefix a, to, and O.Fr. cheve, Fr. chef, the head or end, from L. caput, the head. See CHIEF.] 1. To perform or execute; to accomplish, as some great enterprise; to finish or carry on to a final and prosperous close.

And now great deeds had been achieved. Milton.

2. To gain or obtain, as the result of exertion; to bring about, as by effort.

Show all the spoils by valiant kings achieved. Prior.
I have achieved that reputation, I suppose. Dickens.

Achieve (a-chēv'), v.i. To accomplish some enterprise; to bring about a result intended.

Fights dragon-like, and does achieve as soon
As draw his sword. Shak.

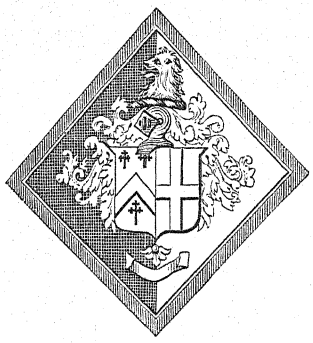
Achievement (a-chēv'ment), n. 1. The act of achieving or performing; an obtaining by exertion; accomplishment; as, the achievement of one's object. —2. That which is achieved; a great or heroic deed; something accomplished by valour or boldness.

The imagination of Xerxes was inflamed with the prospect of rivalling or surpassing the achievements of his glorious predecessors. Ep. Thirlwall.

3. In her. an escutcheon or ensign armorial: a term now generally applied to the funeral shield or hatchment affixed to the dwelling-house of a deceased person or in a church.



Funeral Achievement or Hatchment.

Achiever (a-chēv'ėr), n. One who achieves or accomplishes.

Achillea (a-kil-lē'a), n. [From a belief that Achilles used a plant of this genus to cure Telephus.] A genus of plants; the milfoil genus. See MILFOIL.

Achilleid (a-kil'lē-id), n. A name (rendered familiar by Grote, the historian of Greece) given to those books (i. viii. and xi.–xxii.) of the Iliad in which Achilles is prominent. They are supposed to have formed a separate and original poem, afterwards enlarged and expanded by additions, descriptive of various episodes in the Trojan war, in which other heroes than Achilles figure conspicuously, the whole forming an epic of the Trojan war, and called the Iliad. Those critics who recognize a personal Homer as the author of the Iliad and Odyssey suppose that the Achilleid was an earlier effort, afterwards developed, or that he found the Achilleid and made it the nucleus of a more extended epic.

Achillis tendo (a-kil'lis ten'do), n. [L.] In anat. the tendon of Achilles; the strong tendon of the gastro-cnemius and soleus muscles, which is inserted in the heel: so called because the heel was said to have been the only vulnerable part of the hero.

Achimenes (a-kim'ē-nēz), n. [Perhaps from L. achæmenis, name of an Indian plant.] A genus of tropical and sub-tropical American plants, nat. order Gesneraceæ, much cultivated in our hothouses on account of their ornamental character. Many new forms, developing greater variety and attractiveness than are to be found in the original kinds, have been obtained in the cultivated state. They grow to from 1 to 2 feet high.

Aching (āk'ing), p. and a. Enduring or causing pain; painful.

What peaceful hours I once enjoy'd,
How sweet their memory still;
But they have left an aching void
The world can never fill. Cowper.

Achiote (ä-chi-ō'tā), n. [Sp., from achiolt, the original Indian name of the tree.] The arnotto-tree, and the dye obtained from it. See ARNOTTO.

Achira (ä-chē'ra), n. A plant of the genus Canna (C. edulis), with a large esculent root, yielding tous-les-mois, a starch superior to the ordinary arrow-root. Its tubers are eaten as food in Chili and Peru.

Achirite (ak'i-rit), n. [After Achir Maned, who first brought it from Siberia, and tried to dispose of it for emerald.] Emerald malachite.

Achirus (a-kī'rus), n. [Gr. a, priv., and cheir, a hand.] A genus of fishes, family Pleuronectidæ (flat-fishes), distinguished from all the other genera by the total want of pectoral fins: hence their name. They abound mostly in the East and West Indies, keeping near the shores and furnishing a plentiful supply of wholesome food to the inhabitants. They resemble the common sole in appearance.

Achlamydate (a-klam'id-āt), a. [Gr. a, priv., and chlamys, chlamydos, a cloak.] In zool. not possessing a mantle; as, achlamydate Branchiogasteropoda.

Achlamydeæ (a-kla-mid'ē-ē), n. pl. A group of dicotyledonous plants which want both calyx and corolla, as the willows, oaks, and birches.

Achlamydeous (a-kla-mid'ē-us), a. [Gr. a, priv., and chlamys, a mantle.] A term applied to plants which have neither calyx nor corolla, and whose flowers are consequently destitute of a covering, or naked; without floral envelope.

Achlya (ak'li-a), n. pl. [Gr. achlys, gloom, obscurity—from the doubt regarding their affinities.] A remarkable group of water plants referred by some botanists to the algæ, but by others supposed to be aquatic forms of some fungi. They grow parasitically on dead flies lying in water, on fish, frogs, or decaying plants. They look like little gelatinous tufts, and are composed of colourless filaments.

Achmite (ak'mīt), n. Same as Acmite.

Achor (ā'kor), n. [Gr. achōr, dandruff.] Scald-head, a disease of infants, the face, and often the neck and breast, becoming incrusted with thin yellowish or greenish scabs. It arises in minute whitish pustules which discharge a viscid fluid, which dries into a scab, and is believed to be due to the growth of a fungus.

Achorion (a-kor'i-on), n. [See ACHOR.] A name sometimes given to the fungus which produces the disease achor.

Achras (ak'ras), n. [Gr. achras, the wild pear-tree.] A genus of tropical trees, nat. order Sapotaceæ, with entire leathery leaves, and yielding a copious milky fluid when wounded. One species, A. Sapota (called also Sapota Achras), is the sapodilla plum. See SAPODILLA.

Achromatic (ak-rō-mat'ik), a. [Gr. a, priv., and chrōma, chrōmatos, colour.] Destitute of colour; transmitting light without decomposing it into its primary colours; as, an achromatic lens or telescope. — Achromatic lens, a lense usually composed of two separate lenses, a concave and a convex one, made from substances, as crown-glass and flint-glass, having different refractive and dispersive powers, with the curvatures so adjusted that the chromatic aberration produced by the one is corrected by the other, and light emerges from the compound lens undecomposed. — Achromatic telescope, microscope, a telescope or microscope in which the chromatic aberration is corrected, usually by means of an achromatic object-glass.

Achromaticity (ak'rō-ma-tis''i-ti), n. State of being achromatic.

Achromatism (ak-rō'ma-tizm), n. The state of being achromatic; want of colour. See ACHROMATIC.

Achromatize (a-krō'ma-tīz), v.t. To deprive of colour.

Achromatopsy (a-krō'ma-top-sī), n. [Gr. a, priv., chrōma, colour, and opsis, sight.] Colour blindness, or inability to see or distinguish colours.

Achronic, Achronical (a-kron'ik, a-kron'ik-al), a. See ACRONYC.

Acicula (a-sik'ū-la), n. pl. Aciculæ (a-sik'ū-lē). [L. acicula, a needle.] A name given by naturalists to a spine or prickle of an animal or plant.

Acicular (a-sik'ū-lėr), a. [L. acicula, dim. of acus, a needle; allied to L. acies, Gr. akē, a point. See ACID.] Having the shape of a needle; having sharp points like needles; needle-shaped; as, an acicular prism is one with the crystals long, slender, and straight, as actinolite.

Acicularly (a-sik'ū-lėr-li), adv. In an acicular manner; in the manner of needles or prickles.

Aciculate, Aciculated (a-sik'ū-lāt, a-sik'ū-lāt-ed), a. Needle-shaped; acicular.

Aciculiform (a-sik'ū-li-form), a. [L. acicula, a needle, and forma, shape.] Having the form of a needle or needles.

Aciculus (a-sik'ū-lus), n. [Dim. of L. acus, a needle.] In bot. a strong bristle.

Acid (as'id), a. [L. acidus, sour, from root ac, ak, a point, seen in acus, a needle; acuo, to sharpen; acies, the point or edge of a sword; acer, sharp; aceo, to be sour; acetum, vinegar, and in Gr. akē, akron, a point. The Greek ok, seen in oxys, sharp, ōkys, swift, L. oculus, the eye, is a modified form of the same root. The A. Sax. æced, eced, vinegar, is one of the few non-ecclesiastical words borrowed by the Anglo-Saxons from the Romans. This root appears in many English words (mostly from the Latin), as acrid, acrimony, acumen, acute, ague, axe, edge, &c.] Sour, sharp, or biting to the taste; having the taste of vinegar; as, acid fruits or liquors.

Acid (as'id), n. A sour substance; specifically, in chem. a compound having all or most of the following properties:—(1) A sour taste. [Strong acids require large dilution with water to make this perceptible.] (2) Solubility in water. (3) The power of changing most organic blue and violet colours into red, and of restoring original colours altered by an alkali. (4) The power of decomposing most carbonates, causing effervescence. (5) The power of uniting in definite proportions with the metals, called bases, forming salts, the metal replacing the hydrogen of the acid. (6) The power of exchanging the whole or part of their hydrogen for an alkaline metal presented to them in the form of a hydrate: this last is the only essential property of acids.

Acidiferous (as-id-if'ėr-us), a. [E. acid, and L. fero, to bear.] Bearing, producing, or containing acids, or an acid.—Acidiferous minerals, minerals which consist of an earth combined with an acid, as carbonate of lime, aluminite, &c.

Acidifiable (a-sid'i-fī-a-bl), a. [From ACIDIFY.] Capable of being acidified or converted into an acid.

Acidification (a-sid'i-fi-kā"shon), n. The act or process of acidifying or changing into an acid.

Acidifier (a-sid'i-fī-ėr), n. One who or that which acidifies; an acetifier; specifically, in chem. that which has the property of converting a substance into an acid.

Acidify (a-sid'i-fī), v.t. pret. & pp. acidified; ppr. acidifying. [E. acid, and L. facio, to make.] To make acid; to convert into an acid.

Acidimeter (as-id-im'et-ėr), n. [E. acid, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for determining the purity or strength of acids, founded on the principle mentioned under ACIDIMETRY.

Acidimetry (as-id-im'et-ri), n. The measurement of the strength of acids; especially the process of estimating the amount of acid in any liquid by finding how much of a standard alkaline solution is required to exactly neutralize a measured quantity of the given solution.

Acidity, Acidness (a-sid'i-ti, as'id-nes), n. The quality of being acid or sour; sourness; tartness; sharpness to the taste.

Acidulate (a-sid'ū-lāt), v.t. pret. & pp. acidulated; ppr. acidulating. [Fr. aciduler, to make slightly sour; L. acidulus, slightly sour. See ACID.] To tincture with an acid; to make acid in a moderate degree. Arbuthnot.

Acidulous (a-sid'ū-lus), a. [L. acidulus, slightly sour. See ACID.] Slightly sour; sub-acid; as cream of tartar, oranges, gooseberries, &c.

Aciform (as'i-form), a. [L. acus, a needle, and forma, form.] Shaped like a needle.

Acinaceous (as-in-ā'shus), a. [L. acinus, a grape-stone or kernel.] Full of kernels.

Acinaces (a-sin'a-sēz), n. [L., from Gr. akinakēs, a Persian sword; Per. ahenek, a short sword—ahen, a sword, and ek, a diminutive termination.] A short, straight dagger, worn on the right side, peculiar to the Scythians, Medes, and Persians.

Acinaciform (as-in-as'i-form), a. [L. acinaces, a scimetar, Gr. akinakēs, and L. forma, form.] Formed like or resembling a scimetar; as, an acinaciform leaf, that is, one which has one edge convex and sharp and the other straight and thick, as in Mesembryanthemum.

Acinaciform Leaf.

Acinarious (as-in-ā'ri-us), a. In bot. covered with little spherical stalked vesicles resembling grape-seeds, as in some algæ.

Acineta (a-sin-ē'ta), n. A genus of noble epiphytal orchids, from Central America, much prized in our hothouses.

Aciniform (a-sin'i-form), a. [L. acinus, a grape-stone, and forma, shape.] Having the form of grapes, or being in clusters like grapes; in anat. applied to many glands.

Acinose, Acinous (as'in-ōs, as'in-us), a. [L. acinus, a grape-stone.] Consisting of minute granular concretions.

Acinus (as'in-us), n. pl. Acini (as'in-ī). [L., a grape-stone.] 1. In anat. a name sometimes given to certain glands or glandular bodies, as the pancreas.—2. In bot. one of the small grains which make up some kinds of fruit, as the blackberry, raspberry, &c.; also, a grape-stone.

Acipenser (as-i-pen'sėr), a. [L.] A genus of cartilaginous ganoid fishes, family Acipenseridæ or Sturionidæ, distinguished by the bony scales or plates arranged at intervals along the body in five longitudinal rows. The gills are free as in osseous fishes, the snout long and conical, and the mouth retractile, toothless, and projecting from the under surface of the head. The genus includes the sturgeon, sterlet, huso, &c.

Acipenseridæ (as'i-pen-se''ri-dē), n. pl. The sturgeon family, otherwise called the Sturionidæ.

Aciurgy (as-i-ėr'ji), n. [Gr. akis, a point or something sharp, and ergon, operation.] Operative surgery. [Rare.]

Ackele,† v.t. See AKELE.

Acketon (ak'ton), n. Same as Acton.

Ack-man (ak'man), n. A sailor's term for a fresh-water thief, or one who steals on navigable rivers. Called also an Ack-pirate. Sailor's Word-book.

Acknow † (ak-nō'), v.t. [A. Sax. oncnâwan, to acknowledge.] To recognize; to acknowledge; to confess.

You will not be acknown, sir, why, 'tis wise:
Thus do all gamesters, at all games dissemble.
B. Jonson.

Acknowledge (ak-nol'ej), v.t. pret. & pp. acknowledged; ppr. acknowledging. [Verbal prefix a, and knowledge, O.E. enawlece, knawlage, knowleche, to acknowledge; from the noun (which see).] 1. To own or recognize by avowal as possessing a particular character, or as having certain claims; to recognize or admit as justly represented in a certain light; to assent to the truth of; as, to acknowledge the existence of a God; to acknowledge the inspiration of the Scriptures; to acknowledge a child.

He that acknowledgeth the Son hath the Father also. 1 Jn. ii. 23.

The influence attributed to Cecrops . . . indicates that Athens was acknowledged as the head of this confederacy. Bp. Thirlwall.

The ambassador was acknowledged at the court of St. James. Macaulay.

2. To own or confess, as implying a consciousness of guilt.

I acknowledged my sin unto thee. I said, I will confess my transgressions. Ps. xxxii. 5.

3. To own with gratitude; to own as a benefit.

They his gifts acknowledge not. Milton.

4. To own or avow receiving; as, please to acknowledge this letter.—5. To show recognition by some act, as by a bow, nod, smile, lifting the hat, &c., as a mark of friendship or respect; to salute; as, she met him in the street, but barely acknowledged him.—Acknowledge, Confess. Acknowledge, as contrasted with confess, and applied to things, is usually to admit that we ourselves see and know that we are at fault in acting in a certain way, to allow the truth or justice of some stricture to which we are directly or tacitly subjected, as to acknowledge a fault, to acknowledge our ignorance; confess, on the other hand, is to make known, whether referring to anything alleged against us or not; to confess sins is to make them known, to acknowledge them is to admit that they are sins. Confess is generally applied to actions of more moment than acknowledge. We confess sins and crimes; we acknowledge errors, mistakes, and faults.

All that was required of him to insure forgiveness was to acknowledge that he was in fault.
Miss Braddon.

And both confess'd
Humbly their faults and pardon begg'd. Milton.

Aconite (ak'on-it), n. [L. aconitum, Gr. akoniton.] The plant wolf's-bane or monk's-hood, Aconitum Napellus. See ACONITUM.—Winter aconite (Eranthis hyemalis). See ERANTHIS.

Aconitic (ak-on-it'ik), a. Of or pertaining to aconite.—Aconitic acid, a tribasic acid ($C_6H_6O_6$) obtained from species of the genus Aconitum. It occurs as an amorphous mass, and forms three classes of salts.

Aconitin, Aconitine (ak-on'it-in), n. [See ACONITUM.] ($C_{30}H_{47}NO_7$.) A highly poisonous narcotic alkaloid, got from the roots and leaves of several species of Aconitum. It forms white powdery grains, or a compact, vitreous, transparent mass; is bitter, acrid, and very soluble in alcohol. It is an important anodyne in neuralgia, and contracts the pupil of the eye. One-tenth of a grain is sufficient to kill a sparrow instantly.

Aconitum (ak-on-ī'tum), n. [L.; Gr. akonīton, a poisonous plant, like monk's-hood.] A genus of poisonous plants, nat. order Ranunculaceæ. The species are hardy, herbaceous plants, many of them of great beauty. The Bish or Bikh of Nepaul, used in poisoning arrows, &c., is derived from a plant of this genus, supposed to be a variety of A. Napellus. See WOLF'S-BANE.

Acontiadæ (a-kon-tī'a-dē), n. pl. A family of saurian reptiles, of which the genus Acontias is the type. It includes three genera. See ACONTIAS.

Acontias (a-kon'ti-as), n. [Gr. akontias, a dart, from akōn, a dart.] 1. A genus of timid lacertian reptiles, group Scincoidei, which have rudiments only of the hind limbs, allied to the slow-worm of Britain. They occur in almost all regions, particularly the warm and dry. A. meleagris is sometimes called dart-snake, from its manner of darting on its prey. This snake-like animal is about 3 feet in length, of a light gray colour, with black spots resembling eyes; the belly perfectly white. It is a native of Africa and the Mediterranean isles. 2. In bot. a genus of Brazilian plants, nat. order Araceæ, with spots on their stems like those of the reptiles so called.

Acop† (a-kop'), adv. [Prefix a, on, and cope.] At the top. 'It stands acop.' B. Jonson.

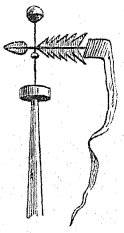
Acoraceæ (a-kor-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. Sweet-flags; a nat. order of herbaceous plants, of which the genus Acorus is the type. They are generally included in the Araceæ, from which they differ only in having hermaphrodite flowers. See ACORUS, SWEET-RUSH.

Acorn (ā'korn), n. [A. Sax. æceren, æcern, an acorn; Goth. akran, fruit; Icel. akarn, Dan. agern, D. aker, L.G. ecker, O.H.G. ackeran, an acorn; the word seems originally to have meant simply fruit, as in Gothic, though in early English it seems to have been regarded as a compound of oak, A. Sax. āc, and corn. It is probably allied to acre (which see).] 1. The fruit of the oak; a one-celled, one-seeded, oval nut, which grows in a permanent cup. In bygone times acorns were used as human food, and are still eaten in different parts of the Continent in scarce years. They form an excellent food for swine.

The first settlers of Boston were reduced to the necessity of feeding on clams, mussels, ground-nuts, and acorns. B. Trumbull.

2. Naut. a small ornamental piece of wood, of a conical or globular shape, sometimes fixed on the point of the spindle above the vane, on the mast-head, to keep the vane from being blown off.—3. See ACORN-SHELL.



Acorn of Coasting Craft.

Acorn-cup (ā'korn-kup), n. The capsule of the acorn. The acorn-cups of the Quercus Ægilops, under the name valonia, have become an important article of commerce, large quantities being used in tanning. See VALONIA.

Acorned (ā'kornd), a. 1. Furnished or loaded with acorns; specifically, in her. said of an oak represented on a coat of arms as loaded with acorns.—2. Fed with acorns.

Acorn-oil (ā'korn-oil), n. An oil expressed from acorns.

Acorn-shell (ā'korn-shel), n. 1. The shell of the acorn.—2. One of the cirripeds of the genus Balanus, allied to the barnacles, called by this name from a supposed resemblance of some of the species to acorns. See BALANUS, CIRRIPEDIA.

Acorus (ak'ō-rus), n. [L., from Gr. akoros, the sweet-flag.] A genus of plants, nat. order Araceæ. A. Calamus, the Calamus aromaticus of druggists, is the sweet-flag or sweet-rush. See SWEET-RUSH.

Acosmia (a-koz'mi-a), n. [Gr. a, priv., and kosmos, order or beauty.] Irregularity in disease, particularly in crises; also, ill-health, with loss of colour in the face. [Rare or obsolete.]

Acosmism (a-koz'mizm), n. [Gr. neg. prefix a, and kosmos, the world in a state of order.] The denial of the existence of an external world. Dean Mansel.

Acosmist (a-koz'mist), n. One who holds the doctrine of acosmism.

Acosmistic (a-koz-mist'ik), a. Pertaining to the doctrine of acosmism.

Acosmium (a-koz'mi-um), n. A group of Brazilian plants belonging to the nat. order Leguminosæ, now included in the genus Sweetia.

Acotyledon (a-kot'il-ē''don), n. [Gr. a, priv., and kotylēdōn, any cup-shaped cavity, from kotylē, a hollow.] In bot. a plant whose seeds, called spores, are not furnished with Acotyledons.

1, Spores of lichens, germinating; 2, Spores of horsetails (Equisetaceæ), germinating; 3, Spores of mosses, germinating.

cotyledons or seed-lobes. In the natural system of Jussieu the Acotyledones form a class which corresponds with the Cryptogamia of Linnæus. See COTYLEDON.

Acotyledonous (a-kot'il-ē''don-us), a. Having no seed-lobes.

Acouchy (a-kösh'i), n. [Fr. acouchi, agouchi, name in Guiana.] An animal belonging to the Caviidæ or guinea-pig family, the olive cavy or Surinam rat, a small species of Agouti inhabiting Guiana.

Acoumeter (a-koum'et-ėr), n. [Gr. akouō, to hear, and metron, measure.] An instrument for measuring the acuteness of the sense of hearing.

Acousmatic (a-kous-mat'ik), n. See ACOUSTIC, n. 2.

Acoustic (a-kous'tik), a. [Gr. akoustikos, from akouō, to hear.] Pertaining to the sense or organs of hearing, or to the doctrine of sounds.—Acoustic duct, in anat. the meatus auditorius, or external passage of the ear. See AUDITORY.—Acoustic vessels, in the anc. drama, brazen tubes or vessels, shaped like a bell, used to propel the voice of the actors, so as to render them audible to a great distance, in some theatres 400 feet.

Acoustic (a-kous'tik), n. 1. In med. a remedy for deafness or imperfect hearing. [Rare.] 2. A name given to such of the disciples of Pythagoras as had not completed their five years' probation. Called also Acousmatics.

Acoustical (a-kous'tik-al), a. Of or belonging to the science of acoustics; acoustic.

This principle, which is important in many acoustical problems, is, in the one now before us, unimportant. Whewell.

Acoustician (a-kous-ti'shan), n. One skilled in the science of sound; a student of acoustics.

The transverse vibrations were the only ones noticed by the earlier acousticians. Whewell.

Acoustics (a-kous'tiks), n. [See ACOUSTIC, a.] The science of sound, teaching the cause, nature, and phenomena of the vibrations of elastic bodies which affect the organ of hearing. The manner in which sound is produced, its transmission through air and other media (sometimes called diacoustics), the doctrine of reflected sound, or echoes (sometimes called catacoustics), the properties and effects of different sounds, including musical sounds or notes, the structure and action of the organ of hearing, are all treated of under acoustics.

Acquaint (ak-kwānt'), v.t. [O.Fr. accointer; Pr. accoindar; L.L. accognitare, to make known, from L. ad, to, and cognitus, known, from cognosco, cognitum, to know, same root as in know, can, ken, cunning, quaint, &c.] 1. To make known; to make fully or intimately known; to make familiar; as, to acquaint one's self with a subject; time and circumstances may acquaint a man with many a strange experience.

A man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief. Isa. liii. 3.

2. To inform; to communicate notice to; as, a friend in the country acquaints me with his success: with is used before the subject of information, if a noun; of was formerly used, but is now obsolete or considered improper.

But for some other reason, my grave sir,
Which is not fit you know, I not acquaint
My father of this business. Shak.

SYN. To inform, apprise, disclose, communicate, make known.

Acquaintable (ak-kwānt'a-bl), a. Easy to be acquainted with; affable. Chaucer.

Acquaintance (ak-kwānt'ans), n. 1. A state of being acquainted, or of having more or less intimate knowledge: used with reference both to persons and things.

If there be no great love in the beginning, yet heaven may decrease it upon better acquaintance, when we are married. Shak.

Such knowledge, however, and fitness for judgment as springs from special skill, and from a familiar acquaintance with the mechanical processes of certain arts, trades, and manufactures, will often be found in this class. Sir G. C. Lewis.

2. A person known to one, especially a person with whom one is not on terms of great intimacy; as, he is not a friend, only an acquaintance.

We see he is ashamed of his nearest acquaintances. Boyle.

3. The whole body of those with whom one is acquainted: in this sense without a plural, the word being plural in meaning. [Todd suggests that acquaintance in this use is catachrestic for acquaintants, on type of accidence for accidents.]

Mine acquaintance are verily estranged from me. Job xix. 13.

—To cultivate one's acquaintance, to endeavour to become intimate with a person.—

Acquaintance, Familiarity, Intimacy. Acquaintance, knowledge arising from occasional intercourse; familiarity, knowledge arising from frequent or daily intercourse; intimacy, unreserved intercourse, intercourse of the closest possible kind.

Nor was his acquaintance less with the famous poets of his age, than with the noblemen and ladies. Dryden.

That familiarity produces neglect has been long observed. Johnson.

The intimacy between the father of Eugenio and Agrestis produced a tender friendship between his sister and Amelia. Hawkesworth.

SYN. Familiarity, intimacy, knowledge, cognizance.

From root ag, ak, as in L. ago, Icel. aka, to drive, the word probably meaning originally the place to or over which cattle were driven; a pasture. Acorn is probably from this root, meaning originally fruit or produce.] 1. Originally, an open, ploughed, or sowed field. This signification was gradually lost after the acre was made a definite measure of surface, which was first done by an act passed in the thirty-first year of Edward III. 'My bosky acres and my unshrubbed down.' Shak. 'Over whose acres walked those blessed feet.' Shak.—2. A quantity of land, containing 160 square rods or perches, or 4840 square yards. This is the English statute or imperial acre which is employed over the United Kingdom and its colonies and in the United States, though Scotland and Ireland have respectively an acre of their own, which is still to some extent used in measurements. The Scotch acre is larger than the English, as it contains 6104·128 square yards, 48 Scotch acres being equal to 61 English acres. The Irish acre is also larger than the English, inasmuch as 100 Irish acres are nearly equivalent to 162 English acres.—God's acre, God's field; the church-yard.

I like that ancient Saxon phrase, which calls
The burial-ground God's acre! It is just;
It consecrates each grave within its walls,
And breathes a benison o'er the sleeping dust.
Longfellow.

Acreable (ā'kėr-a-bl), a. According to the acre; measured or estimated in acres or by the acre.

The acreable produce of the two methods was nearly the same. Complete Farmer.

Acreage (ā'kėr-āj), n. The number of acres in a piece of land; acres taken collectively; as, the acreage of Britain.

No coarse and blockish God of acreage
Stands at thy gate for thee to grovel to. Tennyson.

Acred (ā'kėrd), a. Possessing acres or landed property: used chiefly in composition; as, 'Large-acred men.' Pope. 'Many-acred men.' Sir W. Jones.

Acre-dale (ā'kėr-dāl), n. [A. Sax. æcer, a field, and dæl, a division. See DEAL.] Land in a common field, different parts of which are held by different proprietors. [Provincial English.]

Acre-fight (ā'kėr-fīt), n. [Acre, a field, and fight.] A kind of duel in the open field formerly fought by single combatants, English and Scotch, on the debatable land between the frontiers of their respective kingdoms.

Acre-shot (ā'kėr-shot), n. [Acre, a field, and shot, proportion, reckoning. See SCOT.] A local land-tax or charge. Dugdale.

Acrid (ak'rid), a. [L. acer, acris, acre, sharp; Fr. âcre; root ac. (See ACID.) The termination in this word may have arisen from a spurious form acridus perhaps used in modern scientific Latin.] 1. Sharp or biting to the taste; pungent; bitter; as, acrid salts.—2. Severe; virulent; violent; stinging. 'Acrid temper.' Cowper.—Acrid substances are those which excite in the organs of taste a sensation of pungency and heat, and when applied to the skin irritate and inflame it.—Acrid poisons, including those also called corrosive and escharotic, are those which irritate, corrode, or burn the parts to which they are applied, producing intense burning sensation, and acute pain in the alimentary canal. They include concentrated acids and alkalies, compounds of mercury, arsenic, copper, &c.

Acridia, Acridii (a-krid'i-a, a-krid'i-ī), n. pl. See ACRIDIDÆ.

Acridian (a-krid'i-an), n. One of the Acrididæ.

Acrididæ (a-krid'i-dē), n. A family of orthopterous insects containing the grasshoppers. All the species of this family can leap.

Acridity (a-krid'i-ti), n. Same as Acridness.

Acridness (ak'rid-nes), n. The quality of being acrid or pungent.

Acrimonious (ak-ri-mō'ni-us), a. 1. Abounding in acrimony or acridness; acrid; bitter; corrosive. 'If gall cannot be rendered acrimonious and bitter of itself.' Harvey.—2. Fig. severe; bitter; virulent; caustic; stinging: applied to language, temper, and the like. 'Acrimonious contempt.' Johnson. 'An acrimonious conflict.' Macaulay. [The latter is now the commoner sense.]

Acrimoniously (ak-ri-mō'ni-us-li), adv. In an acrimonious manner; sharply; bitterly; pungently.

Acrimoniousness (ak-ri-mō'ni-us-nes), n. The state or quality of being acrimonious.

Acrimony (ak'ri-mo-ni), n. [L. acrimonia, sharpness, from acris, sharp (see ACID), and affix monia.] 1. A quality of bodies which corrodes, dissolves, or destroys others; also, harshness or extreme bitterness of taste; pungency.

> Those milks (in certain plants) have all an acrimony, though one would think they should be lenitive. Bacon.

2. Fig. sharpness or severity of temper; bitterness of expression proceeding from anger, ill-nature, or petulance; pungency; virulence. 'Acrimony and indignation.' South. 'Acrimony of voice and gesture.' Bp. Hacket.—Acrimony, Asperity, Harshness, Tartness. Acrimony expresses a high degree of bitterness of language proceeding from a soured or malignant temper; asperity refers rather to the manner than the disposition, and does not necessarily imply any malignity of temper, but may be due to a feeling of just indignation; harshness generally implies an undue measure of asperity; tartness expresses a comparatively slight degree of bitterness, and usually implies also a certain amount of wit.

> No order of men have an enmity of more acrimony. Johnson.
> The orators of the opposition declared against him with great animation and asperity. Macaulay.
> My needful seeming harshness, pardon it. Tennyson.
> The popular harangue, the tart reply. Cowper.

Acrisia (a-kris'i-a), n. [Gr. neg. prefix a, and krisis, judgment.] A condition of disease in which no judgment can be formed, or in which an unfavourable judgment must be given. Dunglison.

Acrisy (ak'ri-si), n. [See ACRISIA.] [Rare.] 1. Same as Acrisia.—2. Injudiciousness.

Acrita (ak'ri-ta), n. pl. [Gr. akritos, indiscernible.] A name of the lower Radiata, now called Protozoa, having no distinct discernible nervous system, as sponges.

Acritan, Acrite (ak'ri-tan, ak'rīt), n. One of the Acrita.

Acritical (a-krit'ik-al), a. In med. (a) having no crisis; as, an acritical abscess. (b) Giving no indications of a crisis; as, acritical symptoms.

Acritude (ak'ri-tūd), n. [See ACRID.] An acrid quality; bitterness to the taste; biting heat. [Rare.]

Acrity† (ak'ri-ti), n. [L. acritas, sharpness. See ACRID, &c.] Sharpness; keen severity; strictness. 'The acrity of prudence, and severity of judgment.' Bacon.

Acroamatic, Acroamatical (ak'rō-a-mat''ik, ak'rō-a-mat''ik-al), a. [Gr. akroamatikos, from akroaomai, to hear.] Abstruse; pertaining to deep learning, and opposed to exoteric. Aristotle's lectures were of two kinds: acroatic, acroamatic, or esoteric, which were intended for hearing only and were not committed to writing, and were delivered to a class of select disciples, who had been previously instructed in the elements of learning; and exoteric, which were delivered in public. The former respected being, God, and nature; the principal subjects of the latter were logic, rhetoric, and policy.

> We read no achroamatic lectures. Hales.
> Aristotle was wont to divide his lectures and readings into acroamatical and exoterical. Hales.

Acroamatics (ak'rō-a-mat''iks), n. pl. Aristotle's lectures on the more subtle parts of philosophy. See ACROAMATIC.

Acroatic (ak-rō-at'ik), a. [Gr. akroatikos, pertaining to hearing, from akroaomai, to hear.] Abstruse. Same as Acroamatic (which see).

Acroatics (ak-rō-at'iks), n. pl. Same as Acroamatics.

Acrobat (ak'rō-bat), n. [Gr. akrobateō, to go on tip-toe, to climb upwards—akros, high, on the tip of anything, and bainō, to go.] A rope-dancer; also, one who practises high vaulting, or similar feats of personal agility, as tumbling, throwing somersaults, &c.

Acrobates (a-krob'at-ēz), n. [Gr. akros, high, and bainō, to go.] A sub-genus of Petaurus, a genus of marsupial animals, family Phalangistidæ, indigenous to Australia, containing the opossum mouse (A. pygmæus), one of the smallest of the Marsupialia. It is hardly larger than a mouse, and has a parachute.

Opossum Mouse (Acrobates pygmæus).

Acrocarpi (ak-rō-kärp'ī), n. pl. [Gr. akros, highest, and karpos, fruit.] In bot. a division of the mosses containing the species in which the capsule terminates the growth of a primary axis.

Acrocarpous (ak-rō-kärp'us), a. In bot. applied to mosses whose flower terminates the growth of a primary axis; of or pertaining to the Acrocarpi.

> The flower of mosses either terminates the growth of a primary axis (acrocarpous), or the flower is placed at the end of an axis of the second or third order (pleurocarpous). Sachs.

Acrocephalic (ak'rō-sē-fal''ik), a. [Gr. akros, high, and kephalē, the head.] In ethn. a term applied to the pyramidal or high-skulled tribes of men, or to their skulls.

Acroceraunian (ak'rō-sē-rą''ni-an), a. [Gr. akron, a summit, and keraunos, thunder.] An epithet applied to certain mountains in the north of Epirus in Greece. They project into the Adriatic, and were so termed from being often struck with lightning. Written also Akrokeraunian.

> The thunder-hills of fear,
> The acroceraunian mountains of old name. Byron.

Acrochordon (ak-rō-kord'on), n. [Gr., from akros, high, extreme, and chordē, a string.] An excrescence on the skin, with a slender base.

Acrocinus (ak-rō-sī'nus), n. [Gr. akron, point, kineō, I move.] A genus of longicorn coleopterous insects, family Cerambycidæ, so called from having the spine on each side of the thorax movable. A. longimanus, the harlequin beetle of South America, is the type. It is 2½ inches long, with antennæ 5, and fore-legs alone 4 inches in length.

Acrocomia (ak-rō-kō'mi-a), n. [Gr. akros, extreme, and kōmē, a tuft.] A genus of tropical American plants, nat. order Palmaceæ, allied to the cocoa-palm. The species include some of the most majestic palms, 30 or 40 feet high, and crowned with a tuft of gigantic leaves. A. aculeata has a stem as thick as a man's body, and yields a small round fruit, with a thin, sweetish, astringent pulp, and a nut with a white edible kernel. See MACAW-TREE.

Acrodactylum (ak-rō-dak'til-um), n. [Gr. akros, high, uppermost, and daktylos, a digit.] The upper surface of each digit in a bird.

Acrodont (ak'rō-dont), n. [Gr. akros, high, on the top, and odous, odontos, a tooth.] A term common to those lacertian reptiles which have their teeth united at the top of the alveolar ridge.

Acrodont (ak'rō-dont), a. Pertaining to or resembling the acrodonts; characterized by an arrangement of the teeth like that of the acrodonts.

Acrodus (ak'rō-dus), n. [See ACRODONT.] A genus of placoid fossil fishes, vulgarly styled fossil leeches, with large enamelled striated teeth. The teeth especially are common in the chalk and oolite.

Acrogen (ak'rō-jen), n. [Gr. akros, high, on the top, and gennaō, to produce.] An acrogenous plant. In bot. the acrogens form a division of the Cryptogamia, distinguished by the habits of growth and the mode of impregnation from the Thallogens. They have true stems with leafy appendages (excepting the Riccias and Marchantias), and the embryonic sac is impregnated by the spermatozoids. They are divided into two groups:—(a) Those composed wholly of cellular tissue, the charas, liverworts, and mosses; and (b) Those in which vascular tissue is present, the ferns, horsetails, pillworts, and club-mosses.—The age of acrogens, in geol. the carboniferous era, when acrogens were the characteristic vegetable forms.

Acrogenous (a-kroj'en-us), a. Increasing by growth at the summit, as the tree-ferns; pertaining to the acrogens.

Acrognathus (a-krog'na-thus), n. [Gr. akros, high, and gnathos, the jaw.] A genus of fossil fishes of the salmon family, occurring in the lower chalk.

Acrography (a-krog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. akros, high, and graphō, to write or engrave.] The art of producing designs in relief on metal or stone by etching, for the purpose of printing from them along with type, and thus superseding wood-engraving.

Acroke,† a. Crooked; awkward. 'The matter is acroke.' Chaucer. Written also Acrooke.

Acrolein, Acroleine (a-krō'lē-in), n. [Gr. akros, high, on the top, and L. oleum, oil.] (C_3H_4O.) A colourless limpid liquid obtained by distilling glycerine with acid potassium sulphate. This substance is produced by the destructive distillation of fatty bodies, such as an ordinary candle; it has a most intensely irritating odour. Acrolein is the aldehyde of the allyl series. See ALLYL.

Acrolith (ak'rō-lith), n. [Gr. akros, high, extreme, and lithos, a stone.] In arch. and sculp. a statue, of which only the extremities are stone.

Acrolithan (a-kro'lith-an), a. Pertaining to an acrolith; formed like an acrolith; as, an acrolithan statue.

Acromial (a-krō'mi-al), a. In anat. relating to the acromion.

Acromion (a-krō'mi-on), n. [Gr. akros, high, extreme, and ōmos, shoulder.] In anat. that process of the spine of the scapula which receives the extreme part of the clavicle, and gives attachment to part of the deltoid and trapezius muscles.

Acromonogrammatic (a-krom'o-nō-gram-mat''ik), n. and a. [Gr. akros, extreme, monos, alone, and gramma, a letter.] A term applied to a poetical composition in which every verse begins with the same letter as that with which the preceding verse ends.

Acro-narcotics (ak'rō-när-kot''iks), n. pl. [Gr. akros, extreme, and E. narcotics.] A division of poisons, chiefly of vegetable origin, which irritate and inflame the alimentary canal, and act on the brain and spinal cord, producing stupor, coma, paralysis, and convulsions. Called also Narcotico-acrids or Narcotico-irritants.

Acronyc, Acronycal (a-kron'ik, a-kron'ik-al), a. [Gr. akros, extreme, and nyx, night.] In astron. culminating at midnight: said of a star which rises as the sun sets, and sets as the sun rises, and is, therefore, directly opposite the sun: opposed to cosmical. Spelled also, though improperly, Acronic, Acronical.

Acronycally (a-kron'ik-al-li), adv. In an acronycal manner; so as to culminate at midnight. A star is said to rise and set acronycally when it rises as the sun sets, and sets as the sun rises.

Acropetal (ak'rō-pet-al), a. [Gr. akros, top, and petalon, a leaf.] In bot. having an origin successively nearer the top of the axis, as leaves.

Acropodium (ak-rō-pō'di-um), n. [Gr. akros, the top, and pous, foot.] In zool. the upper surface of the whole foot.

Acropolis (a-krop'o-lis), n. [Gr. akros, high, and polis, a city.] The citadel of a Grecian city, usually situated on an eminence commanding the town, and strong by nature or art; that of Athens contained some of the finest buildings of the city, such as the Parthenon and Erechtheum.

Acrosaurus (ak'rō-są-rus), n. [Gr. akros, extreme, and sauros, a lizard.] An extraordinary fossil reptile, with thirty or forty teeth, and a broad cheek-bone process, occurring in the trias sandstones of South Africa.

Acrospire (ak'rō-spīr), n. [Gr. akros, highest, and speira, a spire, or spiral line.] The first leaf which rises above the ground when corn germinates; also the rudimentary stem or first leaf which appears in malted grain; the developed plumule of the seed.

Acrospired (ak'rō-spīrd), a. Having or exhibiting the acrospire; especially, in malt-making, a term applied to the grains of barley which have sprouted so far as to exhibit the blade or plumule end, the root or radicle also appearing.

Acrosporous (a-kro'spor-us), a. [Gr. akros, a summit, and sporos, seed.] A term apellative of one of the two modes in which fruit is formed in fungi. In this method the spores are naked and produced at the tips of cells. For the other method see ASCIGEROUS.

Across (a-kros'), prep. [Prefix a, and cross.] 1. From side to side: opposed to along, which is in the direction of the length; athwart; quite over; as, a bridge is laid across a river. — 2. Intersecting; passing over at any angle; as, a line passing across another.

Across (a-kros'), adv. 1. From one side to another; crosswise.

With arms across,
He stood, reflecting on his country's loss. Dryden.

2. Adversely; contrarily. 'Things go across.' Mir. for Mags.—3.† Used as a kind of exclamation when a sally of wit miscarried, in allusion to failure when jousting, as at the quintain. 'Good faith, across!' Shak. —To break across, in tilting, to allow one's spear by awkwardness to be broken across by the body of the adversary, instead of by the push of the point.

One said he brake across. Sir P. Sidney.

Acrostic (a-kros'tik), n. [Gr. akrostichion, an acrostic — akros, extreme, and stichos, order or verse.] 1. A composition in verse, in which the first, or the first and last, or certain other letters of the lines, taken in order, form a name, title, motto, &c., which is the subject of the poem. 'Anagrams, chronograms, acrostics.' Burton. — 2. A Hebrew poem of which the initial letters of the lines, or stanzas, were made to run over the letters of the alphabet in their order. Twelve of the psalms are of this character, of which Psalm cxix. is the best example.

Acrostic (a-kros'tik), a. That relates to or contains an acrostic; as, acrostic verses.

Acrostically (a-kros'tik-al-li), adv. In the manner of an acrostic.

Acrotarsium (ak-rō-tär'si-um), n. [Gr. akros, highest, and tarsos, tarsus, sole of the foot.] In anat. the upper surface of the tarsus. See TARSUS.

Acroteleutic (ak'rō-tel-ū''tik), a. [Gr. akros, extreme, and teleutē, end.] Eccles. an appellation given to anything added to the end of a psalm or hymn, as a doxology.

Acroter (ak'ro-tėr), n. Same as Acroterium.

Acroterial (ak-rō-tē'ri-al), a. Pertaining to the acroterium; as, acroterial ornaments.

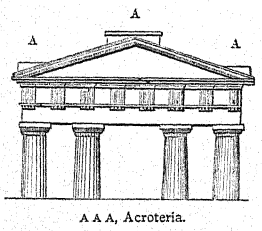
Acroterium (ak-rō-tē'ri-um), n. pl. Acroteria (ak-rō-tē'ri-a). [Gr. akrotērion, a summit, apex, from akros, highest.] 1. In arch. an ornament, the apex or angles of a pediment. The term is generally restricted to the small pedestals placed on the apex and angles of a pediment for the support of statues or other ornaments. It is also used to denote the pinnacles or other ornaments on the horizontal copings or parapets of buildings, and which are sometimes called acroterial ornaments. — 2. In anat. an extremity of the human body, as a hand, a foot, &c.



A A A, Acroteria.

Acrothalliginæ (ak-rō-thal'li-jī''nē), n. pl. [Gr. akros, extreme, thallos, a thallus or frond, and gennaō, to produce.] In bot. a term for cryptogamic plants which increase only at the top, and have thalli in place of leaves.

Acrothymion (ak-rō-thim'i-on), n. [Gr. akros, extreme, and thymos, thyme.] In med. a rugose wart, with a narrow basis and broad top, compared by Celsus to the flower of thyme. Called also Thymus.

Acrotic (a-krot'ik), a. [L.L. acroticus, from Gr. akros, extreme.] Belonging to or affecting external surfaces; as, acrotic diseases.

Acrotomous (a-krot'ō-mus), a. [Gr. akros, extreme, and tomos, a cutting.] In mineral. having a cleavage parallel to the top or base.

Acrylic (a-kril'ik), a. Of or pertaining to acrolein.—Acrylic acid ($C_3H_4O_2$), an agreeably smelling liquid, produced by the oxidation of acrolein. This acid is monobasic, and its salts are very soluble in water.

Act (akt), v.i. [L. ago, actum, to exert power, to put in motion, to do; Gr. agō, to lead; allied to Icel. aka, to drive, and probably to E. acre (which see).] 1. To exert power; to produce effects; as, the stomach acts upon food; the will acts upon the body in producing motion.

How body acts upon the impassive mind. Garth.

2. To be in action or motion; to carry into effect a purpose or determination of the mind.

He hangs between in doubt to act or rest. Pope.

3. To behave, demean, or conduct one's self, as in morals, private duties, or public offices.

He most lives
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.
P. J. Bailey.

4. To perform, as an actor; to represent a character; to feign; as, he acts very well; he is only acting.—To act up to, to equal in action; to perform an action or series of actions correspondent to; to fulfil; as, he has acted up to his engagement or his advantages.

Act (akt), v.t. 1. To transact; to do or perform.

Thou wast a spirit too delicate
To act her earthy and abhorr'd commands. Shak.

Industry doth beget ease by procuring good habits and facility of acting things expedient for us to do. Barrow.

2. To represent as real; to perform on or as on the stage; to play; hence, to feign or counterfeit; as, to act Macbeth; to act the same part nightly. 'With acted fear the villain thus pursued.' Dryden.—3. To perform the office of; to assume the character of; as, to act the hero.—4.† To put in action; to actuate.

Most people in the world are acted by levity and humour. South.

Self-love, the spring of motion, acts the soul. Pope.

Act (akt), n. 1. That which is being done or which has been done; the exertion of power; the effect of which power exerted is the cause; as, the act of giving or receiving; a deed. In this sense it denotes an operation of the mind as well as of the body.

Illustrious acts high raptures do infuse. Waller.

—In the act, in the actual performance or commission: said especially of persons who are caught when engaged in some misdeed.

This woman was taken in the very act. Jn. viii. 4.

—In act to, prepared or ready to; on the very point: implying a certain bodily disposition or posture; as, in act to strike.

Gathering his flowing robe, he seemed to stand
In act to speak, and graceful stretched his hand.
Pope.

2. A state of reality or real existence, as opposed to a possibility; actuality.

The seeds of plants are not at first in act, but in possibility, what they afterwards grow to be. Hooker.

3. A part or division of a play performed without interruption, in which a definite and coherent portion of the plot is represented; generally subdivided into smaller portions, called scenes. — 4. The result of public deliberation, or the decision of a prince, legislative body, council, court of justice, or magistrate; a decree, edict, law, statute, judgment, resolve, award, determination; as, an act of parliament; an act of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland.— 5. In English universities, a thesis maintained in public by a candidate for a degree, or to show the proficiency of a student. At Oxford, the occasion when masters and doctors complete their degrees is also called the act.—6. In law, an instrument or deed in writing, serving to prove the truth of some bargain or transaction; as, I deliver this as my act and deed.—Act of bankruptcy. See under BANKRUPTCY.—Act of faith, auto de fé (which see).—Act of God, in law, an accident or event which takes place without human intervention, and is beyond man's control, as the consequences arising from storms, lightning, &c., and which no party is bound to make good to another, independently of special contract.—Act of grace, a term sometimes applied to general pardons at the beginning of a new reign, &c.—Act of indemnity. See INDEMNITY.—Act of Parliament. See PARLIAMENT. — Act of sederunt, an ordinance of the Court of Session under authority of an act of the Scottish Parliament passed in 1540, by which the judges are empowered to make such statutes as may be necessary for expediting justice.—Action, Act. See ACTION.

Acta (ak'ta), n. pl. [L.] 1. Acts.—2. Specifically, proceedings in a legal or ecclesiastical court. — Acta Sanctorum, the Acts of the Saints, the name sometimes applied to all collections of accounts of ancient saints and martyrs, both of the Roman and Greek Churches, but specifically the name of a work begun by the Bollandists, a society of Jesuits, in 1643, and not yet completed, portions of it still appearing at intervals, it being carried on in the order of the calendar.

Actæa (ak-tē'a), n. [L. actæa, herb-christopher, Gr. aktē, aktea, the elder, from the leaves resembling those of the elder.] A genus of plants, nat. order Ranunculaceæ, found in Europe, the north of Asia, and America. The species are possessed of nauseous and deleterious properties. Two American species are considered to be a remedy for the bite of the rattlesnake—hence called rattlesnake herbs. A. spicata is called in England herb-christopher and bane-berry.

Actian (ak'shi-an), a. Relating to Actium, a town and promontory of Epirus; as, Actian games, which were instituted by Augustus to celebrate his naval victory over Anthony, near that town, Sept. 2, B.C. 31. They were celebrated every five years. Hence, Actian years, reckoned from that era.

Actinenchyma (ak-tin-en' ki-ma), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and enchyma, infusion.] The radiated cellular tissue of some medullas; stellate cellular tissue.

Acting (akt'ing), p. and a. Performing duty, service, or functions; often applied to one who does the real work of an office for a nominal or honorary holder of the post; one who does interim duty for a superior in the case of the latter's absence or decease.

Actinia (ak-tin'i-a), n. A genus of zoophytes, belonging to the Radiata of Cuvier, regarded as the type of the class Actinozoa, sub-kingdom Cœlenterata, in modern classification. The body is cylindrical, and is attached by one extremity, the mouth occupying the middle of the upper or free extremity. Tentacles, disposed in concentric circles, surround the mouth, which, when spread, resemble the petals of a flower; whence the popular name animal-flowers, sea-anemones (which see). They are not perfectly radial in symmetry, the common polyp of the seashore (A. mesembryanthemum) having the oral aperture slightly elliptical, the long axis being marked by a tubercle at either end; the animal thus presents a faint but well-marked indication of bilateral symmetry. They move by alternately contracting and expanding their base, and by their tentacles. The species are often of brilliant colours, and many of them are eaten. See ACTINOZOA.

Actiniadæ (ak-tin-ī'a-dē), n. pl. A family of Cœlenterata, belonging to the order Heli-anthoida, of which the genus Actinia is the type. See ACTINIA.

Actinic (ak-tin'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to actinism; specifically, pertaining to the chemical rays of the sun.—2. In photog. applied to a compound lens when the real image which it gives upon the screen is such that a large number of those coloured rays which exert chemical action upon the substances composing the sensitive tablet are combined with sufficient of the luminous rays to render the image visible. See ACTINISM.

Actiniform (ak-tin'i-form), a. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and L. forma, form.] Having a radiated form.

Actinism (ak'tin-izm), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray.] 1. The radiation of heat or light; or that branch of natural philosophy which treats of the radiation of heat or light.—2. The property of the chemical part of the sun's rays, which, as seen in photography, produces chemical combinations and decompositions. A ray, when decomposed by refraction through a prism, is found to possess three properties, viz. the luminous, the heating, and the chemical or actinic, the two latter acting at opposite ends of the spectrum. The actinic property or force, or actinism, begins among the violet rays, and extends a long way beyond the visible spectrum.

Actinocarpus (ak'tin-ō-kär"pus), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and karpos, fruit.] A genus of plants, nat. order Alismaceæ; star-fruit. A. Damasonium is a British plant, growing in ditches and pools, mostly in a gravelly soil.

Actino-chemistry (ak'tin-ō-kem"is-tri), n. Chemistry in its relation to actinism. See ACTINISM.

Actinograph (ak-tin'ō-graf), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and graphō, to write.] An instrument for measuring and registering the variations of actinic or chemical influence in the solar rays, the intensity of which bears no direct relation to the quantity of light, but varies at different periods of the day and of the year. There are several forms of this instrument, all of them depending on the same principle, namely, the depth of the blackening effect of the chemical rays allowed to fall on a sensitive piece of paper for a given time.

Actinoid (ak'tin-oid), a. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and eidos, likeness.] Resembling a ray or rays; radiated.

Actinoida (ak'tin-oid-a), n. pl. A class of marine Radiata; the same with Actinozoa (which see).

Actinolite (ak-tin'ō-līt), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and lithos, a stone.] A mineral, called by Werner strahlstein (ray-stone), nearly allied to hornblende, and consisting chiefly of silica, calcium, magnesium, and iron.—Actinolite schist, a metamorphic rock consisting principally of actinolite, with an admixture of mica, quartz, or feldspar; its texture is slaty and foliated.

Actinolitic (ak-tin'ō-lit"ik), a. Like or pertaining to actinolite.

Actinometer (ak-tin-om'et-ėr), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and metron, measure.] An instrument for measuring the intensity of the sun's actinic rays. Several of these instruments have been invented based upon the production of certain chemical reactions by means of the chemical rays.

Actinometric (ak-tin'ō-met"rik), a. Of or belonging to the actinometer, or the measurement of the chemical action of the sun's rays.

Actinosoma (ak-tin'ō-sō"ma), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and sōma, body.] A term employed to designate the entire body of any actinozoön, whether this be simple (as in the sea-anemones) or composed of several zoöids (as in most corals).

Actinote (ak'tin-ōt), n. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray.] A radiated mineral, consisting of silicate of calcium and magnesium.

Actinozoa (ak-tin'ō-zō"a), n. pl. [Gr. aktis, aktinos, a ray, and zōon, an animal.] A class of radiated, soft marine zoophytes, embracing the sea-anemones, corals, sea-pens, &c., in which the stomach acts also as a lung, and is separated from the mouth by a space divided into chambers by partitions bearing the reproductive organs. Some are compound, living on a polypidom, some adhere to rocks, &c., and some are free. All have beautifully rayed tentacula arranged around the mouth, which, when displayed, present in some genera, as Actinia, no remote resemblance to some of our finest composite flowers. They are reproduced by germs thrown out at the mouth, by gemmules or buds developed on the base of their disk, and by division, each separated part becoming a complete animal. They present that strange generative phenomenon known as metagenesis or alternation of generation. They, with the Hydrozoa, constitute the sub-kingdom Cœlenterata.

Actinozoon (ak-tin'ō-zō"on), n. [See ACTINOZOA.] An individual member of the Actinozoa, whether simple or compound.

Action (ak'shon), n. [L. actio. See ACT.] 1. The state or manner of acting or being active, as opposed to rest; activity; active exertion; energy manifested in outward acts; bustle or traffic of life; as, a man of action. 'A life of civic action.' Tennyson.

> It is necessary to that perfection of which our present state is capable that the mind and body should both be kept in action. Johnson.
> I myself must mix with action lest I wither by despair. Tennyson.

2. An act or thing done; a deed; an exploit; a feat; specifically, in ethics, any result of activity regarded as proceeding from a moral agent.

> The Lord is a God of knowledge, and by him actions are weighed. 1 Sam. ii. 3.

3. The exertion of power or force by one thing on another; agency; operation; impulse; as, the action of wind upon a ship's sails.—4. In poetry and the drama, the connected series of events on which the interest of the piece depends; the main subject or fable as distinguished from an incidental action or episode. The unity of action is regarded as one of the dramatic unities.

> This action should have three qualifications: first, it should be one action; secondly, it should be an entire action; and thirdly, it should be a great action. Addison.

5. In rhet. gesture or gesticulation; the external deportment of the speaker, or the accommodation of his attitude, voice, gestures, and countenance to the subject, or to the thoughts and feelings of the mind.

> Suit the action to the word, the word to the action. Shak.

6. In physiol. any one of the active processes going on in an organized body; some manifestation of vital activity; the performance of a function; as, the action of the stomach or the gastric juice on the food; a morbid action of the liver. Among these actions some are distinguished as voluntary, as the contractions of the voluntary muscles; involuntary, as those of the lungs and heart; mixed, as those of respiration, deglutition, &c.; reflex, which doubtless include most involuntary actions, but correspond also to those performed by voluntary muscles under the influence of stimuli which do not reach the consciousness.—7. In law, (a) a suit or process, by which a demand is made of a right; a claim made before a tribunal. Actions are real, personal, or mixed; real, or feudal, when the demandant claims a title to real estate; personal, when a man demands a debt, personal duty, or damages in lieu of it, or satisfaction for an injury to person or property; and mixed, when real estate is demanded, with damages for a wrong sustained. Actions are also civil or penal; civil, when instituted solely in behalf of private persons, to recover debts or damages; penal, when instituted to recover a penalty imposed by way of punishment. (b) The right of bringing an action; as, the law gives an action for every claim.—8. [A French usage.] A share in the capital stock of a company, or in the public funds; in the plural, stocks.—9. In painting and sculp. (a) the attitude or position of the several parts of the body, as expressive of the passions or emotions by which it is actuated. (b) The effect of a figure or figures acting together. (c) The principal event which forms the subject of a picture or bas-relief.—10. Battle; fight; engagement between troops, whether on land or water.

> How many gentlemen have you lost in this action? Shak.

11. The mechanism of a pianoforte, organ, or other compound instrument of the same kind.—12. The movement or works of a watch or clock.—13. In the manege, general movements of the limbs and body; as, a horse of fine action.—Quantity of action, in physics, the product of the mass of a body by the space it runs through and its velocity.—Principle of least action, Lagrange's name for a law of motion which he enunciates thus:—'In a system of moving bodies, the sum of the products of the masses of the bodies by the integral of the products of the velocities, and the elements of the spaces passed over is constantly a maximum or minimum.'—Action, Act. In many cases action and act are synonymous, but some distinction between them is observable. Action seems to have more relation to the power that acts, and its operation and process of acting; and act more relation to the effect or operation complete. Action is also more generally used for ordinary transactions, and act for such as are remarkable or dignified; as, all our actions should be regulated by prudence; a prince is distinguished by acts of heroism or humanity. Act is individual, but we speak of a course of action.

Actionable (ak'shon-a-bl), a. Furnishing ground for an action at law; characterized by something for which an action at law may be sustained; as, to call a man a thief is actionable.

Actionably (ak'shon-a-bli), adv. In an actionable manner; in a manner that may subject to legal process.

Actionary, Actionist (ak'shon-a-ri, ak'shon-ist), n. A proprietor of stock in a joint-stock company; one who owns actions or shares of stock. [Rare.]

Action-sermon (ak'shon-sėr'mon), n. In the Scotch Church, the sermon preached prior to the dispensation of the communion.

Action-taking† (ak'shon-tāk-ing), a. Litigious; accustomed to seek redress by law in place of by the sword: a term of contempt. 'A lily-livered, action-taking knave.' Shak.

Actious† (ak'shus), a. Active; full of activity. Warner. [Very rare.]

Actitation (ak-ti-tā'shon), n. [L. actito, actitatum, to act or plead frequently, only spoken of lawsuits and dramas; double freq. from ago, actum, to act.] Frequent action; specifically, the debating of lawsuits. [Rare.]

Activate† (ak'tiv-āt), v.t. To make active; to intensify.

> Snow and ice, especially being holpen, and their cold activated by nitre or salt, will turn water to ice, and that in a few hours. Bacon.

Active (ak'tiv), a. [L. activus; Fr. actif, active. See ACT.] 1. Having the power or property of acting; having the property of causing change or communicating action or motion; having the power to exert an influence; as, attraction is an active power; the active powers of the mind: opposed to passive.—2. Having the power of quick motion, or disposition to move with speed; nimble; lively; brisk; agile; as, an active animal. Hence—3. Busy; constantly engaged in action; pursuing business with vigour and assiduity: opposed to dull, slow, or indolent; as, an active officer. It is also opposed to sedentary; as, an active life. Hence—4. In com. indicating much business; as, an active demand for iron; freights are active.—5. In a state of action, operation, or motion; actually proceeding; accompanied by overt action: opposed to dormant or suspended. 'Active hostilities.' Motley.

> The world hath had in these men fresh experience how dangerous such active errors are. Hooker.

6. In med. applied to certain medicines which produce quick and notable changes upon the body; also, to the method of treatment in which active remedies are used.—7. Requiring action or exertion; practical; operative; producing real effects: opposed to speculative; as, the active duties of life.—8. In gram. (a) with some grammarians, expressing action; as, an active verb. Active verbs are subdivided into two classes, namely, active intransitive and active transitive; the former implying action confined to the actor; as, I walk, run, think; the latter action passing from the actor to an object; as, I chase the hare; I teach the boy. (b) With other grammarians, same as Transitive.—Active capital or wealth, money or property that may readily be converted into money, and used in commerce or other employment for profit.—Active commerce, the commerce in which a nation carries its own and foreign commodities in its own ships, or which is prosecuted by its own citizens, as contra-distinguished from passive, in which the productions of one country are transported by the people of another.—Active or living force, in physics, same as Vis viva (which see).—Active symptoms, in pathol. symptoms of excitement.—SYN. Agile, alert, brisk, vigorous, nimble, lively, quick, sprightly, prompt, industrious, operative.

Active † (ak'tiv), n. That which is active.

It is well knowe, both to reason and experience, every active worcheth on his passive. Chaucer.

Actively (ak'tiv-li), adv. In an active manner; by action; in a state of action; nimbly; briskly; energetically; also in an active signification; as, a word is used actively.

Activement † (ak'tiv-ment), n. Business; employment. Bp. Reynolds.

Activeness (ak'tiv-nes), n. The quality of being active; the faculty of acting; nimbleness; quickness of motion: less used than activity.

What strange agility and activeness do our common tumblers and dancers on the rope attain to. Bp. Wilkins.

Activity (ak-tiv'i-ti), n. The state or quality of being active; the active faculty; active force, or a specific exertion thereof; nimbleness; agility; briskness; also, the habit of diligent and vigorous pursuit of business; as, a man of activity. It is applied to persons or things. 'All those activities, bodily and mental, which constitute our ordinary idea of life.' H. Spencer.

Salt put to ice increaseth the activity of cold. Bacon.

Actless (akt'les), a. Without action or spirit. 'A poor, young, actless, indigested thing.' Southern. [Rare.]

Acton (ak'ton), n. [Fr. hoqueton, O.Fr. acoton, auqueton, Sp. al-cotón, Ar. al-q'oton, from being originally padded with cotton.] A kind of vest or tunic made of taffeta or leather, quilted, worn under the habergeon or coat of mail to save the body from bruises, and sometimes worn alone like a buffcoat; the coat of mail itself. 'His acton it was all of black.' Percy Reliq.

Yet was his helmet hack'd and hew'd,
His acton pierced and tore. Sir W. Scott.

Written also Aketon, Acqueton, Hacqueton. See GAMBESON.

Actor (ak'tėr), n. 1. One that acts or performs; specifically, one that represents a character or acts a part in a play; a stage-player.—2. In law, (a) an advocate or proctor in civil courts or causes. (b) A plaintiff. [In this sense properly a Latin word.]

Actress (ak'tres), n. A female who acts or performs anything.

Virgil has, indeed, admitted Fame as an actress in the Æneid. Addison.

Specifically, a female who represents or acts a part in a play. [In explanation of numerous passages in our old plays, it is to be observed that actresses were not introduced till after the Restoration. In Shakspere's time female parts were performed by boys. 'The king, one night, was impatient to have the play begin. 'Sire,' said Davenant, 'they are shaving the queen.'' Memoirs of Count de Grammont.]

Acts of the Apostles. One of the books of the New Testament, the authorship of which is commonly ascribed to St. Luke. It begins with the ascension of Christ, and gives an account of the early spread of the gospel, and more especially of the part played therein by St. Paul, little being said of the other apostles except St. Peter. The narrative comes down to 62 A.D.

Actual (ak'tū-al), a. 1. Acting or existing really and objectively; existing in act; real; effectively operative; effectual: opposed to virtual, potential, nominal, speculative.

The actual cautery, or the burning the body by a red-hot iron, is opposed to the virtual cautery, which produces the same effect, in a different way, by means of caustics and escharotics. Cruikshank.

So Alfenus was a cobbler, even when not at work, that is, he was a cobbler potential; whereas, when busy in his booth, he was a cobbler actual. Sir W. Hamilton.

Peter the Great, introducing new offices, nominated the eldest Boyars, or those of the first class actual privy-councillors; and those of the second class privy-councillors. Brougham.

For he that but conceives a crime in thought
Contracts the danger of an actual fault. Dryden.

2. Now existing; present; as, in the actual position of affairs.—3.† Active. 'Beside her walking and other actual performances.' Shak.—Actual sin, in theol. that committed by a person himself, in opposition to original sin, inherited from Adam.

Actuality (ak-tū-al'i-ti), n. 1. The state of being actual, as opposed to potentiality; reality, as opposed to ideality.

It will be found that Pope himself has no small portion of this actuality of relation—this nudity of description, and poetry without an atmosphere. Crabbe.

2. That in which anything is realized.

Nature and religion are the bands of friendships; excellency and usefulness are its great endearments; society and neighbourhood, that is, the possibilities and the circumstances of converse, are the determinations and actualities of it. Jer. Taylor.

Actualization (ak'tū-al-iz-ā"shon), n. A making real or actual; the reducing of an idea to a state of actuality or realness; the state of being made actual. 'He (Aristotle) seeks the idea only in its actualization.' J. H. Svelye.

Actualize (ak'tū-al-īz), v.t. To make actual.

Actually (ak'tū-al-li), adv. 1. In fact; really; in truth.—2. With outward and active manifestation.

Of all your sex, yet never did I know
Any that yet so actually did shew
Such rules for patience, such an easy way. Dryden.

Actualness (ak'tū-al-nes), n. The quality of being actual. [Rare.]

Actuarial (ak-tū-ā'ri-al), a. Of or pertaining to an actuary or actuaries, or to the business of an actuary; as, the Actuarial Society of Edinburgh.

Actuary (ak'tū-a-ri), n. [L. actuarius, a clerk, a registrar.] 1. A registrar or clerk: a term of the civil law, and used originally in courts of civil law jurisdiction; specifically, (a) a clerk that registers the acts and constitutions of the lower house of convocation. (b) An officer appointed to keep savings-banks' accounts.—2. An official in a joint-stock company, particularly an insurance company, whose duty it is to make the necessary computations required in the business, and generally to advise on all questions relating to statistics and finance; a person skilled in the doctrine of life annuities and insurances, who is in the habit of giving opinions upon cases of annuities, reversions, &c.

Actuate (ak'tū-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. actuated; ppr. actuating. [From act.] 1. To put into action; to move or incite to action; as, men are actuated by motives or passions.

Men of the greatest abilities are most fired with ambition; and, on the contrary, mean and narrow minds are the least actuated by it. Addison.

2.† To invigorate; to develop; to strengthen: said of inanimate objects.

The light made by this animal depends upon a living spirit, and seems by some vital irradiation to be actuated into this lustre. Sir T. Browne.

3.† To carry out; to execute; to perform. 'To actuate what you command.' Jer. Taylor.

Actuate (ak'tū-āt), a. Put into action. South. [Rare.]

Actuation (ak-tū-ā'shon), n. The state of being put in action; effectual operation.

I have presupposed all things distinct from him to have been produced out of nothing by him, and consequently to be posterior not only to the motion, but the actuation of his will. Bp. Pearson.

Actuator (ak'tū-āt-ėr), n. One who actuates or puts in action.

Actuose (ak'tū-ōs), a. [L. actuosus, from actus, act.] Having the power of action; having strong powers of action. Bailey. [Rare.]

Actuosity (ak-tū-os'i-ti), n. [Rare.] 1. Power or state of action.—2. In metaph. a state of activity which is complete in itself without leading to any result which must be regarded as its completion. 'That actuosity in which the action and its completion coincide, as to think, to see.' J. Hutchison Stirling.

Acture † (ak'tūr), n. Action; performance. Shak.

Actus (ak'tus), n. [L.] In law, a road for passengers riding or driving; a highway. [Rare.]

Acuate † (ak'ū-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. acuated; ppr. acuating. [L. acuo, to sharpen. See ACID.] To sharpen; to make pungent or corrosive.

Immoderate feeding upon pickled meats, and debauching with strong wines, do inflame and acuate the blood. Harvey.

Acuate † (ak'ū-āt), a. Sharpened; pointed. Ashmole.

Acuition † (ak-ū-i'shon), n. [From L. acuo, to sharpen.] The sharpening of medicines to increase their effect, as by the addition of a mineral acid to a vegetable acid.

Acuity † (a-kū'i-ti), n. Sharpness. 'The acuity or bluntness of the pin that bears the card.' Perkins.

Aculeata (a-kū'lē-ā"ta), n. pl. [See ACULEATE.] Sting-bearers, a name sometimes given to a group of hymenopterous insects, in which the abdomen of the females and neuters is armed with a sting, consisting of two fine spiculæ, with reverted barbs, connected with a poison reservoir. It includes bees and wasps.

Aculeate, Aculeated (a-kū'lē-āt, a-kū'lē-āt-ed), a. [L. aculeus, a spine, a prickle, dim. of acus, a needle. See ACID.] 1. In bot. having prickles or sharp points; pointed: used chiefly to denote plants having prickles fixed in the bark, in distinction from thorns, which grow from the wood.—2. In zool. having a sting.

Aculeate (a-kū'lē-āt), n. A hymenopterous insect, one of the Aculeata.

Aculeate (a-kū'lē-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. aculeated; ppr. aculeating. To make pointed; to sharpen. [Rare.]

Aculeiform (a-kū'lē-i-form), a. Formed like a prickle.

Aculeolate (a-kū'lē-ō-lāt), a. In bot. having small prickles or sharp points. Gray.

Aculeous (a-kū'lē-us), a. In bot. having prickles; aculeate; thorny. Sir T. Browne.

Aculeus (a-kū'lē-us), n. pl. Aculei (a-kū'lē-ī). [L.] In bot. a hard, sharp, conical hair, or cellular process of the epidermis or bark of plants; a prickle.

Acumen (a-kū'men), n. [L. acumen, from acuo, to sharpen.] Quickness of perception; the faculty of nice discrimination; mental acuteness or penetration; keenness of insight. 'His learning, above all kings christened, his acumen, his judgment, his memory.' Sir E. Coke.

Acuminate (a-kū'min-āt), a. [L. acuminatus, sharpened, from acumen.] Pointed; acute; specifically, in bot. having a long tapering termination: applied to leaves. When the narrowing takes place at the base it is so expressed, e.g. acuminate at the base; when used without any limitation it always refers to the apex of the leaf.

Acuminate Leaf.

Acuminate (a-kū'min-āt), v.t. To render sharp or keen. 'To acuminate despair.' Cowper. [Rare.]

Acuminate † (a-kū'min-āt), v.i. To taper to a point; to rise like a cone.

They (the bishops) . . . acuminating still higher and higher in a cone of prelaty, instead of healing up the gashes of the church . . . fall to gore one another with their sharp spires, for upper places and precedence. Milton.

Acuminated (a-kū'min-āt-ed), a. Sharpened to a point; acuminate.

This is not acuminated and pointed, as in the rest, but seemeth, as it were, cut off. Sir T. Browne.

Acumination (a-kū'min-ā"shon), n. 1. Act of acuminating, or state of being acuminated; sharpening; termination in a sharp point.—2. Something with a sharp point; a pointed extremity.

The coronary thorns . . . did also pierce his tender and sacred temples to a multiplicity of pains, by their numerous acuminations. Bp. Pearson.

3. Acuteness of intellect. [Rare.]

Wits, which erect and inscribe, with notable zeal and acumination, their memorials in every mind they meet with. Waterhouse.

Acuminose, Acuminous (a-kū'min-ōs, a-kū'min-us), a. In bot. having a sharp or tapering point. [Rare.]

Acupression (ak-ū-pre'shon), n. Acupressure (which see).

Acupressure (ak-ū-pre'shūr), n. [L. acus, a needle, and E. pressure.] In surg. a method of stopping hæmorrhage in arteries in amputations, &c., consisting in pressing the artery closely by means of a pin or needle or bit of inelastic wire, introduced through the sides or flaps of the wound, instead of tying with a thread. There are various modes of inserting the pin.

Acupuncturation (ak-ū-pungk'tūr-ā"shon), n. Pricking with a needle; acupuncture.

Acupuncturator (ak-ū-pungk'tū-rāt-ėr), n. An instrument for performing the operation of acupuncture.

Acupuncture (ak-ū-pungk'tūr), n. [L. acus, a needle, and punctura, a pricking. See PUNCTURE.] 1. A surgical operation resorted to in certain complaints, as in headaches and lethargies, &c., and consisting in the insertion of a delicate needle or set of needles beneath the tissues. This operation has for many ages been practised, and is still in high repute in China, Japan, and India. In modern surgery it is confined to muscular, tendinous, and aponeurotic parts, and is employed chiefly to relieve neuralgic and chronic rheumatic pains, the needles being sometimes used to conduct a galvanic current, and sometimes made hollow to convey an anodyne or sedative into the tissues.—2. A mode of infanticide in some countries, a needle being forced into the brain through the spinal marrow, &c.

Acuru (ak'ö-rö), n. The name in India of a fragrant aloe-wood.

Acutangular (a-kūt'ang-gū-lėr), a. Acute-angular (which see). Warburton.

Acute (a-kūt'), a. [L. acutus, sharp-pointed, from acuo, to sharpen. From root ac, ak, a point. See ACID.] 1. Sharp at the end; ending in a sharp point: opposed to blunt or obtuse; specifically applied in bot. to a leaf or a division of the floral envelope ending in a sharp point; and in geom. to an angle less than a right angle. See ACUTE-ANGLED.—2. Possessing, exhibiting, or characterized by nice discernment or discrimination; perceiving or using minute distinctions, or characterized by the use of such; characterized by keenness of insight: opposed to dull or stupid: (a) applied to persons; as, an acute reasoner. 'The acute and ingenious author.' Locke. (b) Applied to mental endowments; as, the author possesses an acute reasoning faculty. In the following passage Shakspere uses the word in the sense of reaching a high pitch, peculiarly great; but as he puts it in the mouth of a pedant, Schmidt suggests that it may be purposely misused.

Acute Leaves.

The gift (of alliterative rhyming) is good in those in whom it is acute.

(c) Applied to mental performances; as, the reasoning of the author is very acute.—3. Applied to the senses, having nice or quick sensibility; susceptible of slight impressions; having power to feel or perceive small objects; as, a man of acute eyesight, hearing, or feeling.

Were our senses made much quicker and acuter, the appearance and outward scheme of things would have quite another face to us. Locke.

4. Keen; sharp: said of pain.—5. High in pitch; shrill: said of sound: opposed to grave: in this sense specifically applied to an accent which elevates or sharpens the voice.—6. In med. a term applied to a disease which is attended with more or less violent symptoms, and comes speedily to a crisis, as a pleurisy: opposed to chronic.—SYN. Subtle, ingenious, keen, penetrating, sharp, shrill.

Acute (a-kūt'), v.t. To render the accent acute. [Rare.]

He acutes his rising inflection too much. Walker.

Acute-angled (a-kūt'ang-gld), a. Having sharp or acute angles, or angles less than right angles.—An acute-angled triangle, one that has all its angles less than right angles.

Acute-angular (a-kūt'ang-gū-lėr), a. 1. Having an angle less than a right angle.—2. In bot. applied to stems with sharp corners or edges, as in the Labiatæ.

Acutely (a-kūt'li), adv. In an acute manner; sharply; keenly; with nice discrimination.

Acutenaculum (ak'ū-tē-nak''ū-lum), n. [L. acus, a needle, and tenaculum, a holder, from teneo, to hold.] In surg. a needle with a handle, which is used to send it faster through the skin, &c., in stitching a wound.

Acuteness (a-kūt'nes), n. The quality of being acute; as, (a) the quality of being sharp or pointed; as, 'the lance-shaped windows form at their vertex angles of varying degrees of acuteness.' Oxford Glossary. (b) Fig. the faculty of nice discernment or perception; quickness or keenness of the senses or understanding. By an acuteness of the senses or of mental feeling we perceive small objects or slight impressions; by an acuteness of intellect we discern nice distinctions.

Mr. Colbert . . . was a man of probity, of great industry, and knowledge of detail; of great experience and acuteness in the examination of public accounts. Adam Smith.

(c) In rhet. or music, sharpness or elevation of sound. (d) In med. violence of a disease, which brings it speedily to a crisis.

Acutiator† (a-kū'shi-āt''ėr), n. In the middle ages, a person whose office was to sharpen instruments. Before the invention of firearms such officers attended armies to sharpen their weapons.

Acutifoliate (a-kū'ti-fō''li-āt), a. [L. acutus, sharp, from acuo, to sharpen, and folium, a leaf.] In bot. having sharp-pointed leaves. Gray.

Adam (ad'am), n. [Heb. ādām, a human being, male or female, perhaps so called from his ruddiness (ādam, to be red). Gesenius.] 1. The name of the first man; the progenitor of the human race.—2. Jocularly, a serjeant or bailiff: explained by the commentators as referring to the fact that the buff worn by the bailiff resembled the native buff of our first parent.

Not that Adam that kept the garden, but that Adam that keeps the prison. Shak.

3. The frailty inherent in human nature, regarded as inherited from Adam in consequence of the fall.

And whipp'd the offending Adam out of him. Shak.

—Adam's apple, (a) Pomum Adami, the prominence on the fore part of the throat formed by the anterior part of the thyroid cartilage of the larynx, so called from an idle notion that a piece of the forbidden fruit stuck in Adam's throat and occasioned the tumour. (b) A variety of the lime (Citrus Limetta) with a depression, which is fancifully regarded in Italy as the mark of Adam's teeth. See CITRON.—Adam and Eve, the popular name in the United States for a terrestrial orchid (Aplectrum hiemale). —Adam's needle, the popular name of a genus of liliaceous plants, Yucca (which see).—Adam's ale, Adam's wine, water. [Colloq.]

Adamant (ad'a-mant), n. [L. adamas, adamantis, Gr. adamas, the hardest iron or steel, anything inflexible, the diamond; lit. the unconquerable—Gr. a, priv., and damaō, to tame. See TAME and DIAMOND.] 1. A term formerly sometimes equivalent to diamond, but generally, as is now the case, used vaguely to express any substance of impenetrable hardness: it is chiefly a rhetorical or poetical word.

As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead. Ezek. iii. 9.

But who would force the soul, tilts with a straw Against a champion cased in adamant. Wordsworth.

2.† Loadstone or magnet: a sense not uncommon in our earlier writers, though it is not easy to see why the word should have assumed this meaning.

You draw me, you hard-hearted adamant,
And yet you draw not iron, for my heart
Is true as steel. Shak.

Adamantean (ad'a-mant-ē''an), a. Hard as adamant.

Useless the forgery
Of brazen shield and spear, the hammer'd cuirass,
Chalybean temper'd steel, and frock of mail

Adamantine (ad-a-mant'in), a. 1. Made of adamant; having the qualities of adamant; impenetrable. 'In adamantine chains shall death be bound.' Pope.

Each gun
From its adamantine lips
Flung a death-cloud round the ships. Campbell.

2. Resembling the diamond in hardness or in sparkling lustre.—Adamantine spar, (a) a very hard, hair-brown variety of corundum, often of adamantine, or diamond-like lustre. It yields a very hard powder used in polishing diamonds and other gems. (b) A hair-brown sapphire. (c) Corundum, from its hardness or peculiar occasional lustre. See CORUNDUM.

Adamic (a-dam'ik), a. Pertaining to Adam. —Adamic earth, common red clay, from a notion that Adam means red earth.

Adamite (ad'am-īt), n. Eccles. one of a sect of visionaries of the second century, who pretended to establish a state of innocence, and, like Adam, went naked. They abhorred marriage, holding it to be the effect of sin. Several attempts have been made to revive this sect, one as late as the fifteenth century.

Adamitic (ad-am-it'ik), a. Of or pertaining to, or resembling the Adamites.

Nor is it other than rustic or Adamitic impudence to confine nature to itself. Jer. Taylor.

Adansonia (ad-an-sō'ni-a), n. [From M. Adanson, a French botanist who travelled in Senegal.] A genus of plants, nat. order Sterculiaceæ. A. digitata is the African calabash-tree, or baobab-tree of Senegal. (See BAOBAB.) A. Gregorii, the only other species, is the cream-of-tartar tree of North Australia. See CREAM-OF-TARTAR TREE under CREAM.

Adapis (ad'a-pis), n. [Gr. a, intens., and dapis, a rug.] An extinct thick-skinned mammal of the tertiary formation, somewhat resembling a hedgehog, but about three times its size, discovered by Cuvier in the plaster quarries near Paris. Its teeth combine the characters of the Anoplotherium and the tapir.

Adapt (a-dapt'), v.t. [L. ad, to, and apto, to fit; Gr. haptō, to cling to, to overtake; Skr. āp, to come to, to obtain.] 1. To make suitable; to make to correspond; to fit or suit; to proportion.

A good poet will adapt the very sounds, as well as words, to the things he treats of. Pope.

For nature, always in the right,
To your decays, adapts my sight. Swift.

2. Specifically, to remodel, work up, and render fit for representation on the stage, as a play from a foreign language or a novel.

Adaptability (a-dapt'a-bil''i-ti), n. The quality of being capable of adaptation.

Addison's Disease (ad'di-sunz diz-ēz'), n. A structural disease of the supra-renal capsules characterized by anæmia, extreme prostration, and the brownish olive-green colour of the skin. Called also Supra-renal Melasma or Bronzed-skin Disease, first described by Dr. Addison.

Additament (ad-dit'a-ment), n. [L. additamentum, an addition, from addo, additum, to add. See ADD.] An addition, or the thing added. [Rare.]

In a palace . . . there are certain additaments that contribute to its ornament and use. Sir M. Hale.

Addition (ad-di'shon), n. [L. additio, from addo, to add.] 1. The act or process of adding: opposed to subtraction or diminution; as, a sum is increased by addition; to increase a heap by the addition of more. Specifically, in arith. the uniting of two or more numbers in one sum; also, the rule or branch of arithmetic which treats of adding numbers. Simple addition is the adding of numbers, irrespective of any things denoted by them, or the adding of sums of the same denomination, as pounds to pounds, shillings to shillings, &c. Compound addition is the adding of sums of different denominations, as pounds, shillings, and pence to pounds, shillings, and pence.—2. Anything added, whether material or immaterial. Specifically, (a) in law, a title annexed to a man's name to show his rank, occupation, or place of residence; as, John Doe, Esq.; Richard Roe, Gent.; Robert Dale, Mason; Thomas Way, of Glasgow. In Scots law the term designation has the same signification. By 14 and 15 Vict. c. no indictment shall be held insufficient for want of or imperfection in the addition of any defendant. Hence, (b) Any epithet applied to a person, or any added designation. [A use frequent in Shakspere, but now obsolete.]

They clepe us drunkards, and with swinish phrase
Soil our addition. Shak.

This man, lady, hath robbed many beasts of their particular additions; he is as valiant as the lion, churlish as the bear, slow as the elephant. Shak.

(c) † In music, a dot at the side of a note to lengthen its sound one-half. (d) In her. something added to a coat of arms as a mark of honour: opposed to abatement, as bordure, quarter, canton, gyron, pile, &c. See these terms. (e) In distilling, anything added to the wash or liquor in a state of fermentation.—Syn. Increase, accession, augmentation, annexation, superaddition, additament, increment, appendage, adjunct.

Adjectival (ad-jek-tīv'al or ad'jek-tiv-al), a. Belonging to or like an adjective; having the import of an adjective.

Adjectivally (ad-jek-tīv'al-li or ad'jek-tiv-al-li), adv. By way of, or as, an adjective; as, a noun or participle adjectivally used.

Adjective (ad'jek-tiv), n. [L. adjectivum, from adjectivus, being added. See ADJECT.] In gram. a word used with a noun to express a quality of the thing named, or something attributed to it, or to specify or describe a thing as distinct from something else, and so to limit and define it. It is called also an attributive or attribute. Thus in the phrase, A wise ruler, wise is the adjective or attribute, expressing a particular property of ruler, while by excluding all rulers who are not wise it very greatly limits the application of the noun, and so tends to define it.

Adjective (ad'jek-tiv), a. 1. Pertaining to an adjective; as, the adjective use of a noun. 2. Added or adjected; additional. [Rare.]—Adjective colours, in dyeing, colours which, having but slight attraction, require to be fixed by some base or mordant in order to render them permanent.

Adjective (ad'jek-tiv), v.t. pret. & pp. adjectived; ppr. adjectiving. To make an adjective of; to form into an adjective; to give the character of an adjective to.

In English, instead of adjectiving our own nouns, we have borrowed in immense numbers adjectived signs from other languages, without borrowing the unadjectived signs of these ideas. Horne Tooke.

Adjectively (ad'jek-tiv-li), adv. In the manner of an adjective; as, a word is used adjectively.

Adjoin (ad-join'), v.t. [Fr. adjoindre; L. adjungo—ad, to, and jungo, to join. See JOIN.] To join or add; to put in addition; to unite; to annex or append.

2. The period during which a public body adjourns its sittings; as, during an adjournment of six weeks.—Adjournment, Recess, Prorogation, Dissolution. An adjournment is the time or interval during which a public body defers business or suspends its meetings in virtue of authority inherent in itself. A recess is a customary suspension of business, as during the period of certain stated or recognized holidays; as, the Easter recess. A prorogation is the adjournment of the sittings of the body at the instance of the superior authority, as the sovereign, which called it together, during which the body can hold no sittings, but, in order to do so, must be again summoned; the close of a session of the British Parliament is called a prorogation. A dissolution is the act by which the body, as such, is broken up, and its members dismissed from their duties. During a dissolution the body has no existence, and has to be reconstituted by the authority to whom it owes its existence, as by a new election, when it may consist of the same or of new members.

Adjudge (ad-juj'), v.t. pret. & pp. adjudged; ppr. adjudging. [Fr. adjuger, from L. adjudicare—ad, to, and judicare, to judge, from judex, judge. See JUDGE.] 1. To award judicially in the case of a controverted question; to assign; as, the prize was adjudged to him who seemed most worthy.—2. To decide by a judicial opinion or sentence; to adjudicate upon; to determine; to settle; as, the case was adjudged in Hilary term.—3. To pass sentence on; to sentence or condemn. 'Those rebel spirits adjudged to hell.' Milton.—4. To deem; to judge. [Rare.]

Admirability (ad'mi-ra-bil"i-ti), n. Admirableness. Bailey. [Rare.]

Admirable (ad'mi-ra-bl), a. [L. admirabilis, wonderful, admirable, from admiror, to wonder at, to admire.] 1. † Fitted to excite wonder; wonderful; strange; astonishing; amazing.

It seemeth equally admirable to me that holy King Edward the Sixth should do any wrong, or harsh Edward the Fourth do any right to the Muses.
Fuller.

In man there is nothing admirable but his ignorance and weakness.
Jer. Taylor.

2. Worthy of admiration; having qualities to excite wonder, with approbation, esteem, reverence, or affection; most excellent: used of persons or things.

What a piece of work is a man! How noble in reason! How infinite in faculty! In form and moving, how express and admirable!
Shak.

Admirableness (ad'mi-ra-bl-nes), n. The quality of being admirable; the power of exciting admiration.

Admirably (ad'mi-ra-bli), adv. In an admirable manner; in a manner to excite wonder, mingled with approbation, esteem, or veneration.

Admiral (ad'mi-ral), n. [O.E. amiral, ammiral, amirail, admirald, Fr. amiral, It. ammiraglio, L.L. amiralius, from Ar. amir, emir, a prince, chief, with the Ar. article suffixed, being supposed by Diez to be a contraction of such forms as amīr-ul-mā, ruler of the water, or amīr-ul-ba'hr, ruler of the sea; Ar. amr, or amārā, to command; Heb. ămar, Chal. amăr, to say, to command.] 1. A naval officer of the highest rank; a commander-in-chief of a fleet or navy. In the British navy admirals were formerly divided into three classes, named after the colours of their respective flags, admirals of the red, of the white, and of the blue, with vice-admirals and rear-admirals of each flag. In 1864, however, this distinction was given up, and now there is one flag common to all ships of war, namely, the white ensign divided into four quarters by the cross of St. George, and having the Union in the upper corner next the staff; while, instead of nine, there are now only three degrees of this rank, namely, admiral, vice-admiral, and rear-admiral. The admiral displays his flag at the maintop-gallant-mast head.—

Admiral of the fleet, an honorary title of distinction conferred on a few admirals, and carrying an increase of pay along with it. —Vice-admiral, (a) an officer next in rank and command to the admiral. He carries his flag at the foretop-gallant-mast head. (b) A name also given to certain officers, as the lords-lieutenant of counties, governors of colonies, &c., who have power to hold courts of vice-admiralty.—Rear-admiral, an officer next in rank to the vice-admiral. He carries his flag at the mizzentop-gallant-mast head.—Lord high admiral, in Great Britain, an officer who (when this rare dignity is conferred) is at the head of the naval administration of Great Britain. There have been few high admirals since 1632, when the office was first put in commission. James Duke of York (afterwards James II.) held it for several years during Charles II.'s reign. In the reign of William and Mary it was vested in lords commissioners of the admiralty, and since that time it has been held for short periods only by Prince George of Denmark in the time of Queen Anne, and by William IV., then Duke of Clarence, in 1827–28. The lords commissioners of the admiralty were formerly seven, but are now four in number, with the addition of a civil lord; the first lord is always a member of the cabinet, and it is he who principally exercises the powers of the office.—2. The ship which carries the admiral; also, the most considerable ship of any fleet, as of merchantmen or of fishing vessels. [Milton uses the form Ammiral (which see) in this sense.]

> Like some mighty admiral, dark and terrible, bearing down upon his antagonist with all his canvas straining to the wind, and all his thunders roaring from his broadsides. E. Everett.

3. A name given to two species of butterflies: Vanessa atalanta, or red admiral, and Limenitis camilla, or white admiral.

Admiral (ad'mi-ral), a. Carrying an admiral; chief in a fleet.

> The admiral galley . . . struck upon a rock. Knolles.

Admiral-shell (ad'mi-ral-shel), n. The popular name of a sub-genus of magnificent shells of the genus Voluta. See VOLUTA.

Admiralship (ad'mi-ral-ship), n. The office or power of an admiral. [Rare.]

Admiralty (ad'mi-ral-ti), n. 1. The office and jurisdiction of the lords commissioners appointed to take the general management of maritime affairs, and of all matters relating to the royal navy, with the government of its various departments.—2. The officers appointed for the administration of naval affairs; a board of naval commissioners. The lords commissioners of the admiralty are now four in number, exclusive of a civil lord. See under ADMIRAL.—3. The building in which the lords of the admiralty transact business, and in which the clerks and other officials connected with this department are employed.—Admiralty court, or court of admiralty, a tribunal having jurisdiction over maritime causes, whether of a civil or criminal nature. It was formerly held before the lord high admiral, and was afterwards presided over by his deputy or the deputy of the lords commissioners. It now forms a branch of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty division of the High Court of Justice, the judge in it being appointed by the crown as one of the judges of the High Court. The court of admiralty is twofold: the instance court and the prize court. The civil jurisdiction of the instance court extends generally to such contracts as are made upon the sea, and are founded in maritime service or consideration. It also regulates many other points of maritime law—as disputes between part-owners of vessels, and questions relating to salvage. It has likewise power to inquire into certain wrongs or injuries committed on the high seas, as in cases of collision. In criminal matters the court of admiralty has, partly by common law and partly by a variety of statutes, cognizance of piracy and all other indictable offences committed either upon the sea, or on the coasts when beyond the limits of any English county. The prize court is the only tribunal for deciding what is and what is not lawful prize, and for adjudicating upon all matters, civil and criminal, relating to prize, or every acquisition made by the law of war, which is either itself of a maritime character, or is made, whether at sea or by land, by a naval force. The court of admiralty for Scotland was abolished by 1 William IV. lxix., and the cases formerly brought before this court are now prosecuted in the Court of Session or in the sheriff court, in the same way as ordinary civil causes. —Droits of Admiralty. See DROITS.

Admirance † (ad-mīr'ans), n. Admiration.

> (She) with great admirance inwardly was moved,
> And honoured him with all that her behoved. Spenser.

Admiration (ad-mi-rā'shon), n. 1.† Wonder; astonishment; amazement; surprise.

> And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints . . . and when I saw her I wondered with great admiration. Rev. xvii. 6.
> Your boldness I with admiration see. Dryden.

2. Wonder mingled with pleasing emotions, as approbation, esteem, love, or veneration; a compound emotion excited by something novel, great, beautiful, or excellent; as, admiration of virtue or goodness, admiration of a beautiful woman or a fine picture.

> There is a pleasure in admiration, and this is that which properly causeth admiration, when we discover a great deal in an object which we understand to be excellent. Tillotson.

Admirative † (ad'mi-rā-tiv), n. The point of exclamation or admiration, marked thus (!).

Admire (ad-mīr'), v.t. pret. & pp. admired; ppr. admiring. [L. admiror—ad, and miror, to wonder; Fr. admirer.] 1.† To regard with simple wonder, amazement, or surprise; to wonder at.

> Neither is it to be admired that Henry, who was a wise as well as a valiant prince, should be pleased to have the greatest wit of those times in his interests. Dryden.
> M. Alphonse de Beauchamp makes the wall to feet without appearing to admire the leap. Southey.

2. To regard with wonder mingled with approbation, esteem, reverence, or affection; to feel admiration for; to take pleasure in the beauty of; to look on or contemplate with pleasure; as, to admire virtue; to admire the works of the Creator; to admire a landscape or a painting; to admire a woman.

> And Enid woke and sat beside the couch,
> Admiring him, and thought within herself,
> Was ever man so grandly made as he? Tennyson.

Admire (ad-mīr'), v.i. 1. To wonder; to be affected with surprise; to marvel.

> Let none admire
> That riches grow in hell. Milton.
> I admire where a fellow of his low rank should acquire such a nobleness and dignity of sentiment. Henry Brooke.

Sometimes with at. 'Admired at his own contrivance.' Ray.

> When I ride about in winter and see such prodigious flocks of various kinds of birds I cannot help admiring at these congregations. Gilbert White.

2. To feel or express admiration.

> I'll report it,
> Where senators shall mingle tears with smiles;
> Where great patricians shall attend, and shrug,
> I' the end, admire. Shak.

Admired (ad-mīrd'), p. and a. Regarded with wonder; wonderful; admirable.

> You have displaced the mirth, broke the good meeting,
> With most admir'd disorder. Shak.

Admirer (ad-mīr'ėr), n. One who admires or feels admiration; one who esteems greatly; colloquially, one who pays court to a woman; one who openly shows his admiration of a woman; a lover.

> For fear of Lucia's escape, the mother is . . . constantly attended by a rival that explains her age, and draws off the eyes of her admirers. Tatler.

Admiringly (ad-mīr'ing-li), adv. In an admiring manner; with admiration; in the manner of an admirer.

Admissibility (ad-mis'i-bil"i-ti), n. The quality of being admissible.

Admissible (ad-mis'i-bl), a. [Fr. admissible, L.L. admissibilis, from admitto, admissum, to admit.] That may be admitted, allowed, or conceded; as, the testimony is admissible.

Admissibly (ad-mis'i-bli), adv. In an admissible manner; so as to be admitted.

Admission (ad-mi'shon), n. [L. admissio—ad, to, and mitto, missum, to send. See MISSION.] 1. The act or practice of admitting; the state of being admitted; as, the admission of aliens into a country.—2. Admittance; power or permission to enter; entrance; access; power to approach; as, to grant a person admission.

> What numbers groan for sad admission there! Young.

3. Eccles. (a) in the Church of England, the act of a bishop admitting or allowing a clerk to enter a cure to which he has been presented. (b) In the Church of Scotland, an act of a presbytery admitting a minister to his church, or, as the law expresses it, collating him to his benefice.—4. The granting of an argument or position not fully proved; a point or statement admitted; allowance; as, this admission lost him the argument.—5. Acknowledgment; confession of a charge, error, or crime; as, he made full admission of his guilt.—Admissions in a suit, in law, those facts or matters necessary to support the case of a plaintiff, or of the defendant, in a suit in equity, the necessity of proving which is removed by the opposite party admitting them. Admissions are either upon the record or by agreement between the parties.—SYN. Admittance, access, entrance, concession.

Admissory (ad-mis'so-ri), a. Granting admittance; admitting.

Admit (ad-mit'), v.t. pret. & pp. admitted; ppr. admitting. [L. admitto—ad, to, and mitto, to send.] 1. To suffer to enter; to grant entrance to, whether into a place or an office, or into the mind or consideration; as, to admit a student into college; to admit a serious thought into the mind.—2. To give right of entrance to; as, a ticket admits one into a play-house.—3. To grant in argument; to receive as true; as, the argument or fact is admitted.—4. Till by the heel and hand admonished. Burns.

5. Eccles. to reprove a member of the church for a fault, either publicly or privately: the first step in church discipline. It has a like use in colleges.

Admonisher (ad-mon'ish-ėr), n. One who reproves or counsels.

Horace was a mild admonisher, a court satirist fit for the gentle times of Augustus. Dryden.

Admonishment (ad-mon'ish-ment), n. Admonition; counsel; warning.

When was my lord so much ungently temper'd
To stop his ears against admonishment?
Unarm, unarm, and do not fight to-day. Shak.
Thy grave admonishments prevail with me. Shak.

Admonition (ad-mō-ni'shon), n. The act of admonishing; counsel or advice; gentle reproof; instruction in duties; caution; direction.

Now all these things happened unto them for ensamples; and they are written for our admonition.
1 Cor. x. 11.

Eccles. public or private reproof to reclaim an offender: a step preliminary to excommunication.—Admonition, Reprehension, Reproof. Admonition, a caution or warning, containing instruction as regards duty or conduct for future guidance; reprehension and reproof are both retrospective. The former is rather the milder of the two and expresses literally the act of taking back, as if to compel attention to the error committed, hence a finding fault with for something done; reproof, an authoritative fault-finding, censure addressed to inferiors and children.

A man that is an heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject. Tit. iii. 10.

The admonitions, fraternal or paternal, of his fellow-Christians, or the governors of the church, then more public reprehensions. Hammond.

Those best can bear reproof who merit praise.
Pope.

Adonia (a-dō'ni-a), n. A festival of two days' duration celebrated anciently in honour of Adonis, by females. The first day was spent in mourning and lamentation, and the second in feasting and merry-making.

Adonic (a-don'ik), a. Of or pertaining to Adonis.—Adonic verse. See the noun.

Adonic (a-don'ik), n. An Adonic verse: so called, it is said, because used in songs sung at the Adonia, or festival of Adonis. It consists of a dactyl and a spondee or trochee, as rārā jūvēntūs, and on account of its animated movement is adapted to gay and lively poetry. It is, however, seldom used by itself, but joined with other kinds of verse.

Adonis (a-dō'nis), n. [This was the name of the sun-god among the Phœnicians, of same origin as Heb. adonai, lord, adon, master.] 1. In Greek myth. the favourite of Aphroditē (Venus), said to be the son of Cinyras, king of Cyprus. He was fond of hunting, and received a mortal wound from the tusk of a wild boar. Aphroditē lamented his death, and changed him into the plant which bears his name. This name is often used as typical of manly beauty, or is applied to one who is excessively particular in his dress; an exquisite; as, he is quite an Adonis. 2. In bot. a genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Ranunculaceæ. In the corn-adonis (A. autumnalis) the petals are bright scarlet, and are considered as emblematical of the blood of Adonis, from which the plant is fabled to have sprung.

Adonise, Adonize (ad'on-īz), v.t. [From Adonis (which see).] To make beautiful or attractive; to adorn one's self with the view of attracting admiration: said only of males. [Rare.]

I employed three good hours at least in adjusting and adonizing myself. Smollett.

Adonist (a-dōn'ist), n. [Heb. Chal. and Syriac, Adon, Lord, a scriptural title of the Supreme Being.] One of a sect or party of Biblical critics who maintain that the Hebrew points ordinarily annexed to the consonants of the word Jehovah are not the natural points belonging to that word, and that they do not express the true pronunciation of it; but that they are vowel-points belonging to the words Adonai and Elohim, applied to the ineffable name Jehovah, which the Jews were forbid to utter, and the true pronunciation of which was lost; they were therefore always to pronounce the word Adonai instead of Jehovah.

Adoors† (a-dōrz'), adv. [A for at, and doors.] At doors; at the door.

I took him in adoors,
A straggling beggar outcast from his shores.
Vicar, 1630.

Adopt (a-dopt'), v.t. [L. adopto—ad, and opto, to desire or choose. See OPTION.] 1. To take a stranger into one's family as son and heir; to take one who is not a child and treat him as one, giving him a title to the privileges and rights of a child.—2. To take, select, or receive as one's own; as, to adopt the opinions of another; to adopt a particular mode of husbandry.

I have adopted the Roman sentiment, that it is more honourable to save a citizen than to kill an enemy. Johnson.

Adoptedly (a-dopt'ed-li), adv. In the manner of something adopted. 'Adoptedly, as school-maids change their names.' Shak.

Adopter (a-dopt'ėr), n. 1. One who or that which adopts.—2. In chem. a large round receiver, with two necks, diametrically opposite to each other, one of which admits the neck of a retort, and the other is joined to another receiver. It is used in distillations to give more space to elastic vapours, or to increase the length of the neck of a retort.

Adoptian (a-dop'shi-an), a. Of or pertaining to the doctrine of adoption.—Adoptian controversy (eccles.), a controversy which originated in Spain in the eighth century with the Archbishop of Toledo, who maintained that although Christ, in respect of his divine nature, was by generation the Son of God, yet that, as regards his human nature, he was only a declared and adopted son. The heresy was condemned by several synods, but it has reappeared at various times, and was defended by, amongst others, Duns Scotus, in the fourteenth century.

Adoption (a-dop'shon), n. [L. adoptio. See ADOPT.] 1. The act of adopting, or the state of being adopted; the taking and treating of a stranger as one's own child; as, the adoption of a child; a son by adoption.—2. The receiving of a person into a more intimate relation than formerly; reception; admission; as, the adoption of a person into a society.—3. The act of adopting or receiving as one's own what is new or not natural; selection; assumption; as, the adoption of a method of agriculture.

The adoption of vice has ruined ten times more young men than natural inclinations.
Lord Chesterfield.

Adoptionist (a-dop'shon-ist), n. One who maintains that Christ was the Son of God by adoption only. Prof. Murdock.

Adoptious† (a-dop'shus), a. Adoptive; that is adopted or assumed. 'Pretty, fond, adoptious christendoms.' Shak.

Adoptive (a-dopt'iv), a. [L. adoptivus.] 1. Constituted by adoption; adopting or adopted. 'Adoptive father.' Ayliffe. 'Adoptive son.' Bacon.—2. Assumed. 'Adoptive and cheerful boldness.' Milton.—Adoptive arms, in her. arms enjoyed by the concession of another which the adopter is obliged to marshal with his own, as being the condition of some honour or estate left him.

Adoptive (a-dopt'iv), n. A person or thing adopted.

Adorability (a-dōr'a-bil''i-ti), n. Quality of being adorable. Coleridge.

Adorable (a-dōr'a-bl), a. 1. Demanding adoration; worthy of being adored; worthy of divine honours. 'The adorable Author of Christianity.' Cheyne.—2. Worthy of the utmost love or respect.

Adorableness (a-dōr'a-bl-nes), n. The quality of being adorable, or worthy of adoration.

Adorably (a-dōr'a-bli), adv. In a manner worthy of adoration.

Adoration (ad-ōr-ā'shon), n. 1. The act of adoring; the act of paying honours, as to a divine being; worship addressed to a deity; in the Christian Church, the supreme and highest form of worship due to God alone; sometimes used specifically of words addressed to the Deity expressive of a sense of his infinite holiness and perfection.

Lowly reverent
Towards either throne they bow, and to the ground
With solemn adoration down they cast
Their crowns. Milton.

In the R. Cath. Ch. the word sometimes expresses an inferior sort of divine homage; thus, it may be applied (a) to the homage paid to the eucharist, because Catholics believe in the real presence of Christ in the sacramental elements. (b) To the ceremony of prostration before the crucifix practised in all Catholic churches on Good Friday. (c) To the worship paid to the Virgin, saints, angels, and relics. [Considered an improper usage, however.] The term is also applied to a ceremonious manifestation of respect and submission shown by the cardinals to the pope after his election.—2. Homage, or an act of homage, paid to one in high esteem or place; profound reverence; the utmost respect, regard, or esteem; the highest degree of love, as of a man for a woman; heart's devotion.

How does he love me?
With adorations, fertile tears,
With groans that thunder love, with sighs of fire. Shak.

3. A mode by which the cardinals in conclave sometimes elect the Roman pontiff. In adoration, unlike scrutiny, the cardinals rush hastily, as if actuated by some overpowering internal impulse, and elect a pope by acclamation.—4. In art, a pictorial representation of the adoration of the infant Jesus by the magi and the shepherds.

Adore (a-dōr'), v.t. pret. & pp. adored; ppr. adoring. [L. adoro, to ask in prayer, to adore—ad, to, and oro, to ask. Root or, seen also in os, oris, the mouth.] 1. Adulteration (a-dul'tėr-ā'shon), n. The act of adulterating, or the state of being adulterated or debased by foreign mixture; the use of ingredients in the production of any professedly genuine article, which are cheaper and of a worse quality, or which are not considered so desirable by the consumer as other or genuine ingredients for which they are substituted. The adulteration of liquors, drugs, tea, bread, beer, &c., is punishable by law. See further in extract.

Adulteration, a term not only applied in its proper sense to the systematic mixture of articles of commerce, food, drink, drugs, &c., with noxious or inferior ingredients, but also by magistrates and analysts to accidental impurity, and even in some cases to actual substitution. The chief objects of adulteration are to increase the weight or volume of the article, such as water added to milk, butter, &c.; to give a colour which either makes a good article more pleasing to the eye or else disguises an inferior one, as Prussian blue, black lead, &c., to green teas, annatto to cheese, alum to bread, &c.; to substitute a cheaper form of the article, or the same substance from which the strength has been extracted, as tea mixed with spent leaves; and to give it a false strength, as cocculus indicus to beer and alcohol to wine. Pop. Ency.

Adulterator (a-dul'tėr-āt-ėr), n. One who adulterates.

Adulterer (a-dul'tėr-ėr), n. [Formed either from the E. verb adulter, or more probably from L. adulter, with an additional English noun termination.] 1. Adultery (a-dul'tėr-i), n. [L. adulterium. See ADULTERATE.] 1. Violation of the marriage-bed; a crime or a civil injury which introduces or may introduce a spurious offspring into a family. When committed between two married persons it is sometimes termed double adultery; and when only one of the parties is married it is termed single adultery. In many continental countries adultery is regarded as a criminal offence, but in none does the punishment exceed imprisonment for a short period accompanied by a fine. In England, formerly, it was punished by fine and imprisonment, and in Scotland it was frequently made a capital offence. In Great Britain at the present day, however, it is punishable only by ecclesiastical censure. But when committed by the wife, adultery is regarded as a civil injury, and forms the ground of an action of damages against the paramour. No corresponding action is competent to the wife either in England or America. Adultery forms the most common ground of divorce. See DIVORCE.—2. In Scrip. (a) all manner of lewdness or unchastity, as forbidden by the seventh commandment. Mat. v. 28. (b) Idolatry or apostasy from the true God. Jer. iii. 8.—3. I will, according to your advisement, declare the evils which seem most hurtful. Spenser.

2. Deliberation; circumspection; consultation.

Among those that do all things with advisement there is wisdom. Prov. xiii. 10 (Trans. 1539).

Adviser (ad-vīz'ėr), n. 1. One who gives advice or admonition; also, in a bad sense, one who instigates or persuades. Specifically—2. In politics, one of the royal counsellors or ministers, who are legally responsible for the sovereign's acts in his or her official capacity.

The advisers whom necessity had compelled Charles to call around him were by no means men after his own heart. Macaulay.

Advisership (ad-vīz'ėr-ship), n. The office of an adviser. [Rare.]

Advising (ad-vīz'ing), n. Advice; counsel.

Fasten your ear on my advisings. Shak.

Advise† (ad-vīz'ō), n. Advice; consideration. 'Counsels and advisos.' Whitlock.

Advisory (ad-vīz'o-ri), a. 1. Having power to advise.

The general association has a general advisory superintendence over all the ministers and churches. B. Trumbull.

2. Containing advice; as, their opinion is merely advisory.

Advize† (ad-vīz'), v.t. and i. Same as Advise. Spenser.

Advocacy (ad'vō-ka-si), n. 1. The act of pleading for; intercession.—2.† Judicial pleading; lawsuit. Chaucer.

Advocate (ad'vō-kāt), n. [L. advocatus, one summoned to aid, counsel, or plead for—ad, to, and voco, vocatum, to call. See VOICE, VOCAL.] 1. One who pleads the cause of another in a court of law. Specifically, (a) the title given to the counsel who practised in the ecclesiastical and admiralty courts in England, which, as separate courts, are now extinct. (b) The title given in Scotland, first, to the counsel practising before the supreme court, and, second, to those procurators or solicitors who act before the inferior courts at Aberdeen, and are members of the society there.—2. One who defends, vindicates, or espouses a cause by argument; a pleader in favour of; an upholder; a defender; as, an advocate for peace or for the oppressed.

That cause seems commonly the better that has the better advocate. Sir W. Temple.

In Scrip. Christ is called an advocate for his people. 'We have an advocate with the father.' 1 Jn. ii. 1.—3. Eccles. (a) a person appointed to defend the rights and revenues of a church or monastery. (b) Formerly, the patron of a church or owner of an advowson. See ADVOWSON.—Faculty of advocates, in Scotland, a society of lawyers, who practise in the highest courts, and who are admitted members after following a certain course of study, undergoing the prescribed examinations, and paying the requisite fees. It consists of about 400 members, and from this body vacancies on the bench are supplied.—Lord advocate, in Scotland, the principal crown counsel in civil cases, the public prosecutor of crimes, and an important political functionary in the management of Scottish affairs. His tenure of office ceases with that of the administration with which he is connected. He is assisted in the discharge of his duties by the solicitor-general and four advocates-depute, appointed by himself. The lord advocate has usually a seat in parliament, and before the Union he had his seat ex officio. He is called also Crown Advocate, Queen's (or King's) Advocate.—Judge advocate, in courts-martial, a person who manages the prosecution.—Devil's advocate, (a) in R. Cath. Ch. a person appointed to act as accuser of any one proposed for canonization at the examination preceding this rite, and to state all possible objections to its consummation. Hence, (b) a scandal-monger; one given to bring forward malicious accusations.—God's advocate, in R. Cath. Ch. the defender of the character of the person proposed for canonization at the examination preceding this rite.

Advocate (ad'vō-kāt), v.t. pret. & pp. advocated; ppr. advocating. 1. To plead in favour of; to defend by argument before a tribunal; to support or vindicate.

This is the only thing distinct and sensible which has been advocated. Burke.

The most eminent orators were engaged to advocate his cause. Mitford.

2. In Scots law, formerly to transfer from an inferior court to the Court of Session, as an action while still pending, or after judgment had been given, in order that the judgment might be reviewed. See ADVOCATION.

Advocate (ad'vō-kāt), v.i. To act as an advocate; to plead. 'To advocate in my own child's behalf.' Dawbeny. [Rare.]

Advocateship (ad'vō-kāt-ship), n. The office or duty of an advocate.

Advocatess† (ad'vō-kāt-es), n. A female advocate. [Rare.]

God hath provided us with an advocatess. Jer. Taylor.

Advocation (ad-vō-kā'shon), n. 1. The act of advocating; a pleading for; plea; apology.

My advocation is not now in time. Shak.

2. In Scots law, a form of process, the object of which was to remove a cause from an inferior to the Supreme Court, in order that a judgment might be reviewed, or that future procedure might be conducted in the Court of Session. Abolished in 1868, a simple appeal being substituted.

Advocatus Dei (ad-vō-kā'tus dē'i), n. [L.] Same as God's Advocate. See under ADVOCATE.

Advocatus Diaboli (ad-vō-kā'tus dī-a'bō-li), n. [L.] Same as Devil's Advocate. See under ADVOCATE.

Advoke (ad-vōk'), v.t. [L. advoco, to summon—ad, to, and voco, to call.] To transfer to a higher court. [Rare and obsolete.]

(He) had privately prevailed with the pope to advoke the cause to Rome. Fuller.

Advolation† (ad-vō-lā'shon), n. [L. ad, to, and volo, volatum, to fly.] Act of flying to something. Bailey.

Advolution† (ad-vō-lū'shon), n. [L. ad, to, and volvo, volutum, to roll.] A rolling towards something. Bailey.

Advoutrer† (ad-vou'trėr), n. [O. Fr. advoutre, advoultre, from L. adulter, an adulterer. See ADULTERATE.] An adulterer.

Advoutress† (ad-vou'tres), n. An adulteress.

Advoutrous† (ad-vou'trus), a. Adulterous.

Advoutry † (ad-vou'tri), n. [See ADVOUTRER.] Adultery. 'A marriage compounded between an advoutry and a rape.' Bacon.

Advowee (ad-vou-ē'), n. One who has the right of advowson.

Advowson (ad-vou'sn), n. [O. Fr. advoeson, right of presentation to a church living, from L. advocatio, advocationis, a calling to one for help. In the early ages of the church ecclesiastics could not appear before lay tribunals. They therefore had recourse to the aid of laymen to plead their cause, and these persons receive the name of advocates, Fr. avoués. In the decline of the Roman Empire, when defence from violence was more necessary than legal skill, the church selected as their advocates powerful nobles able to defend her property from rapine and plunder or enrich her by donations, and in return conferred on them the right of presentation to livings. Advocatio thus came to mean not only defence in a court, and protection, aid, and support generally, but also the right of presentation to a living, to which last meaning advowson is now restricted. Patronus, the Latin name for an advocate in the court, a protector, benefactor, has undergone a similar change of meaning, and now signifies the person in whom such a right vests.] The right of presentation to a vacant benefice. Advowsons are of three kinds, presentative, collative, and donative; presentative when the patron presents his clerk to the bishop of the diocese to be instituted; collative when the bishop is the patron, and institutes or collates his clerk by a single act; donative when a church is founded by the king, and assigned to the patron, without being subject to the ordinary, so that the patron confers the benefice on his clerk without presentation, institution, or induction. Advowsons are also appendant, that is, annexed to a manor; or in gross, that is, annexed to the person of the patron.

Advoyer, Avoyer (ad-voi'ėr, a-voi'ėr), n. [Fr. avoyer.] A chief magistrate of a town or canton in Switzerland.

Adward† (ad-ward'). Same as Award. Spenser.

Adynamic, Adynamical (a-di-nam'ik, a-di-nam'ik-al), a. [See ADYNAMY.] Weak; destitute of strength.—Adynamic fevers, a term employed by Pinel to denote malignant or putrid fevers, attended with great muscular debility.

Adynamon (a-din'a-mon), n. [See ADYNAMY.] A factitious wine made of must boiled down with water, or of new white wine and water, often given to the sick when pure wine would be injurious.

Adynamy (a-din'a-mi), n. [Fr. adynamie, Gr. adynamia, a, priv., and dynamis, power.] In med. weakness; want of strength occasioned by disease; a deficiency of vital power.

Adyt† (ad'it), n. Same as Adytum.

Adytum (ad'i-tum), n. pl. Adyta (ad'i-ta). [L. adytum, Gr. adyton, an adytum, a shrine, a place not to be entered—a, priv., and dyō, to go into, to enter.] 1. A secret place of retirement in the ancient temples, esteemed the most sacred; the innermost sanctuary or shrine. From this place the oracles were given, and none but the priests were permitted to enter into it. The Jewish sanctum sanctorum or Holy of Holies was a similar part of the temple of Jerusalem.—2. The chancel or altar-end of a church.

Adze, Adz (adz), n. [O.E. addice, A. Sax. adese, an adze.] A cutting instrument used for chipping the surface of timber. It consists of a blade of iron forming a portion of a cylindrical surface, ground to an edge from the concave side outwards at one end, and having a hole or socket at the other end for the handle.

Adze.

Adze (adz), v.t. To chip or shape with an adze; as, to adze logs of timber.

Æ. The symbol used to denote the third class of wooden and composite ships in Lloyd's register. See A1.

Æchmodus (ēk'mō-dus), n. [L., from Gr. aichmē, a point, and odous, a tooth.] A genus of fossil ganoid fishes, family Lepidoidei, remarkable for their small, sharp-pointed teeth, found in the lias.

Aedilis (ē-dī'lis), n. [L.] Same as Edile. North.

Aefauld (ā-fạld'), a. [Sc. aè, one, and fald, fold.] [Scotch.] 1. Honest; upright; without duplicity.—2.† Rarely used to denote the unity of the divine essence in a trinity of persons. Barbour.

Aefauldness (ā-fạld'nes), n. Honesty; uprightness; straightforwardness; singleness of heart; freedom from duplicity. [Scotch.]

Ægagrus (ē-gag'rus), n. [Gr. aigagros—aix, aigos, a goat, and agros, a field.] A wild species of ibex (Capra ægagrus), found in troops on the Caucasus, and many Asiatic mountains. It is believed to be the original source of at least one variety of the domestic goat. In its stomach and intestines, as in those of other artiodactyles, are found the concretions called bezoar-stones.

Ægean (ē-jē'an), a. See EGEAN.

Ægeriidæ (ē-jėr-ī'i-dē), n.pl. [From the typical genus Aegeria, which name again is taken from that of the Roman nymph Egeria.] A family of Lepidoptera, section Heterocera, comprising a moderate number of interesting insects. The larvæ live in the interior of the branches or roots of trees. Some of them feed upon the apple. One species (Ægeria tipuliformis) is destructive to currant-bushes, feeding on the pith.

Ægiceras (ē-jis'ér-as), n. [Gr. aix, aigos, a goat, and keras, a horn.] A genus of small trees, nat. order Myrsinaceæ, natives of the swampy shores of India and Australia. Their seeds germinate while still on the trees, and send down perpendicular roots into the mud, and thus form impenetrable thickets, constituting the only vegetation for miles along some coasts, particularly of Sumatra.

Ægilopical, a. Same as Egilopical.

Ægilops, n. Same as Egilops.

Ægis (ē'jis), n. [Gr. aigis, a goat skin, the ægis, from aix, a goat.] 1. In Greek myth. originally the skin of the goat Amalthea which suckled Zeus, and which skin was afterwards worn by him as part of his armour or as a covering of his shield; also the shield itself. In later times the ægis was represented as part of the armour of Pallas Athena, and appears as a kind of breastplate covered with metal scales, and made terrible by the head of the Gorgon Medusa, being also fringed with serpents.

Pallas wearing the Ægis.—From an antique statue.

Hence—2. Anything that protects. 'Under the imperial aegis.' Gretton.

Ægle (ē'glē), n. [Gr. aiglē, splendour, a female name in Greek mythology.] A genus of plants, nat. order Aurantiaceæ, with separate stamens. A. Marmelos (the Bengal quince, golden apple, or bhel) has a delicious aperient fruit, somewhat like an orange. A perfume and a yellow dye are got from the rind, and a cement from the mucus of the seed.

Ægophonic, a. Same as Egophonic.

Ægophony, n. Same as Egophony.

Ægrotat (ē-grō'tat), n. [L., he is sick.] In Eng. universities, a medical certificate given to a student showing that he has been prevented by sickness from attending to his duties.

Æneid (ē'nē-id), n. [L. Æneis, genit. Æneidis or Æneidos.] An epic poem written by Virgil, of which Æneas, a Trojan, is the hero. It describes the taking of Troy by the Greeks, the subsequent wanderings of Æneas, and the final settlement of himself and companions in Italy.

Æolian (ē-ō'li-an), a. Same as Eolian.

Æolic, n. and a. See EOLIC.

Æolidæ (ē-ol'i-dē), n. pl. A family of nudibranchiate gasteropod molluscs. See EOLIDÆ.

Æolina (ē-ō-lī'na), n. [From Æolus, the god of the winds.] A modification of the accordion invented by Wheatstone before the concertina.

Æolipile. Same as Eolipile.

Æolist (ē'ol-ist), n. [From Æolus, the god of the winds.] A pretender to inspiration. Swift.

Æolophon (ē-ol'ō-fon), n. [From Æolus, the god of the winds, and Gr. phōnē, voice.] Another name for the Seraphine.

Æolus (ē'ō-lus), n. [L., the god of the winds.] An apparatus for renewing the air in rooms.

Æon, n. Same as Eon.

Æpyornis (ē-pi-or'nis), n. [Gr. aipys, aipyos, high, and ornis, a bird.] A genus of gigantic birds found fossil in Madagascar. It had three toes like Dinornis, but it is not certain whether it ought to be classed with the cursorial birds or with the raptorial. Its eggs measured 14 inches in length: the bird which laid them may well have been the roc of eastern tradition. Written also Epiornis.

Æquisonant, a. Same as Equisonant.

Ærarian (ē-rā'ri-an), n. [L. ærarius, from æs, æris, bronze, bronze money.] A Roman citizen of the lowest class of free-men, who paid only a poll-tax, and had not the suffrage.

Aerate (ā'ėr-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. aerated; ppr. aerating. [See AIR.] 1. To combine with carbonic acid or other gas, or with air.—2. In physiol. to change the circulating fluids of animals by the agency of the air; to arterialize.—Aerated waters, a term applied to a variety of acidulous and alkaline beverages, more or less impregnated with carbonic acid. Aerated waters are brisk, sparkling, or effervescing beverages, of a pungent, and sometimes of a pleasantly acidulous taste. The most common, carbonic acid water, usually called soda-water, is made on a large scale by pouring dilute sulphuric acid on carbonate of lime, whiting, or chalk. Carbonic acid gas is evolved, which is received into a reservoir, and then by means of a pump or otherwise forced into water, which takes up five times its volume of gas. A small quantity of essence of ginger or extract of capsicums mixed with sugar placed in the bottles before filling them converts this into gingerade; while essence of lemon, with citric acid and sugar, gives lemonade. All water from natural springs is more or less aerated; and the flat, mawkish taste of recently boiled water is due to the absence of carbonic acid gas and atmospheric air. Aerated waters are made on a small scale for domestic use by means of a gazogene, in which bicarbonate of soda and tartaric acid are used to evolve the carbonic acid.

Aeration (ā-ėr-ā'shon), n. 1. The act or operation of combining or saturating with a gas, as carbonic acid or common air.—2. In physiol. the change in the circulating fluids of animals effected by the agency of air, as the arterialization of the venous blood by respiration in the higher animals and the corresponding changes in the lower animals.—Aeration of soils, the exposing of them to the action of air by means of ploughing, harrowing, &c.

Aerator (ā'ėr-āt-ėr), n. [L. aer, the air.] 1. A blower; a contrivance for fumigating wheat and other corn, to bleach it and destroy fungi and insects.—2. An apparatus for making aerated waters.

Aerial (ā-ē'ri-al), a. [L. aërius. See AIR.] 1. Belonging or pertaining to the air or atmosphere; inhabiting or frequenting the air; growing, existing, or happening in the air; produced by or in the air; as, aerial regions; aerial perspective; aerial songsters; aerial roots; aerial ascents. 'The aerial blue.' Shak. 'Aerial honey and ambrosial dew.' Dryden.—2. Consisting of air; partaking of the nature of air; as, aerial particles.—3. Reaching far into the air; high; lofty; elevated; as, aerial spires; aerial flight.—4. Possessed of a light and graceful beauty.

> Some music is above me; most music is beneath me. I like Beethoven and Mozart—or else some of the aerial compositions of the older Italians.
> Coleridge.

—Aerial acid, an old name for carbonic acid, from a belief that it entered into the composition of atmospheric air.—Aerial plants, those which absorb their food from the atmosphere, as lichens, epiphytal orchids, &c.—Aerial perspective. See under PERSPECTIVE.—Aerial tints, in painting, tints or modifications of colour by which the expression of distance is attained.—Aerial figures, those by which painters seek to represent the fabled inhabitants of the air, as demons, genii, gnomes, &c.—Aerial images, images which are caused by the convergence of rays of light reflected or refracted from objects through strata of air of different densities, the images appearing suspended in the air, as the different kinds of mirage; also those images perceived by looking into or towards a concave mirror.—Aerial poisons. Same as Miasma.—Aerial railway, a railway supported in the air by posts, such as is to be seen in some of the towns of the United States.—Aerial rocks, in geol. same as Eolian rocks (which see under EOLIAN).

Aerially (ā-ē'ri-al-li), adv. In an aerial manner; so as to resemble air or the atmosphere.

> Your eyes
> Touched with a somewhat darker hue,
> And less aerially blue. Tennyson.

Aerian (ā-ē'ri-an), n. Eccles. one of a branch of Arians, so called from Aerius, who maintained that there is no difference between bishops and priests.

Aerides (ā-er'i-dēz), n. [L. aer, the air.] A genus of epiphytal plants, nat. order Orchidaceæ. These plants have distichous leaves, and large brightly-coloured and sweet-scented flowers. They are natives of the warmer parts of Asia, and are extensively cultivated in hothouses.

Aerie (ē'rē or ā'ėr-i), n. [Fr. and Pr. aire, Norm. aery, L.L. aeria, aerea, aria, area, an aerie. Littré, Mahn, and Ed. Müller refer all these forms to the L. area, an open space, an area, a plot or bed of ground, &c.; in later times a waste uncultivated place, though the connection of meanings is not very clear; probably L. aer, air, may have had some influence on the form of the word, aeries being situated aloft in the air. Wedgwood considers aer to have been the origin of the word through the notions of air, climate, and hence residence.] 1. The nest of a bird of prey, as of an eagle or hawk.—2. A brood of eagles or hawks.—3. An eagle. [Rare.]

> Your aerie buildeth in our aerie's nest. Shak.

4. An elevated spot. [Rare and poetical.]

Wherever beauty dwell,
In gulf or aerie, mountain or deep dell. Keats.

Written also Eyry, Eyrie.

Aeriferous (ā-ēr-if'ėr-us), a. [L. aer, air, and fero, to carry.] Conveying air, as the larynx and bronchial tubes, and the trachea of insects.

Aerification (ā'ėr-i-fi-kā"shon), n. 1. The act of combining air with anything; the state of being filled with air.—2. The act of becoming air or of changing into an aeriform state, as substances which are converted from a liquid or solid form into gas or an elastic vapour; the state of being aeriform.

Aeriform (ā'ėr-i-form), a. [L. aer, air, and forma, form.] Having the form or nature of air, or of an elastic invisible fluid. The gases are aeriform fluids.

Aerify (ā'ėr-i-fī), v.t. pret. & pp. aerified; ppr. aerifying. [L. aer, air, and facio, to make.] 1. To infuse air into; to fill with air, or to combine air with.—2. To change into an aeriform state.

Aerocyst (ā'ėr-ō-sist), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and kystis, a bladder.] In bot. the air-vessel, or bladder, by means of which many algæ, as Fucus vesiculosus, are supported in the water, and oceanic species, as the Gulf-weed, float on the surface.

Aerodynamics (ā'ėr-ō-di-nam"iks), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and dynamis, power.] The science which treats of the motion of the air and other gases, or of their properties and mechanical effects when put in motion.

Aerognosy, Aerography (ā-ėr-og'nō-si, ā-ėr-og'ra-fi), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and gnōsis, knowledge, graphō, to describe.] Aerology (which see). [Rare.]

Aerohydrodynamic (ā'ėr-ō-hī'drō-di-nam"-ik), a. [Gr. aēr, air, hydōr, water, and dynamis, power.] Acting by the power of air and water.—Aerohydrodynamic wheel, an apparatus invented by M. Calles, a Belgian engineer, for transmitting power to a great distance. It consists of a wheel submerged in water, under which air forcibly driven through a tube is discharged so as in ascending to make the wheel revolve. E. H. Knight.

Aerolite (ā'ėr-ō-līt), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and lithos, a stone.] A stone falling from the air or atmospheric regions; a meteoric stone; a meteorite. There have been many conjectures as to the source of aerolites. By some they have been supposed to be projected by lunar volcanoes to a distance beyond the sphere of the moon's attraction; by others they have been thought to be formed in the air by the union of simpler forms of matter volatilized from the earth's surface; but they are, most probably, cosmical bodies of the same nature as shooting-stars, revolving round the earth, and falling into it when they come within the sphere of its attraction. Some of them are large, weighing 15 tons. They are all found to agree in their constituent parts, and are covered with a thin, slag-like crust of a deep black colour, probably produced by strong, transient heating in their rapid passage through the air. Their exterior is roughened with small projections, and they are destitute of gloss. Internally their texture is granulated, and of a grayish colour; they appear composed of a number of small spherical bodies and metallic grains imbedded in a softer matter. When analyzed they are found to consist of twenty-two of the elements found in terrestrial minerals, the most prominent components being malleable metallic iron and nickel.

Aerolith (ā'ėr-ō-lith), n. Same as Aerolite.

Aerolithology (ā'ėr-ō-lith-ol'o-ji), n. [Gr. aēr, air, lithos, a stone, and logos, discourse.] The science of aerolites. Dana.

Aerolitic (ā'ėr-ō-lit"ik), a. Relating to aerolites.

Aerologic, Aerological (ā'ėr-ō-loj"ik, ā'ėr-ō-loj"ik-al), a. Pertaining to aerology.

Aerologist (ā-ėr-ol'o-jist), n. One who is versed in aerology.

Aerology (ā-ėr-ol'o-ji), n. [Gr. aēr, aeros, air, and logos, description.] That branch of physics which treats of the air, its constituent parts, properties, and phenomena.

Aeromancy (ā'ėr-ō-man"si), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and manteia, divination.] Divination by means of the air and winds or atmospheric substances: now sometimes used to denote the practice of forecasting changes in the weather.

Aerometer (ā-ėr-om'et-ėr), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and metron, measure.] An instrument for weighing air, or for ascertaining the density of air and gases.

Aerometric (ā'ėr-ō-met"rik), a. Pertaining to aerometry; measuring air.

Aerometry (ā-ėr-om'et-ri), n. The science of measuring the weight or density of air and gases, including the doctrine of its pressure, elasticity, rarefaction, and condensation.

Aeronaut (ā'ėr-ō-nąt), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and nautēs, a sailor, from naus, a ship.] One who sails or floats in the air; an aerial navigator; a balloonist.

Aeronautic, Aeronautical (ā'ėr-ō-nąt"ik, ā'ėr-ō-nąt"ik-al), a. Pertaining to aeronautics or aerial sailing.

Aeronautics (ā'ėr-ō-nąt"iks), n. The doctrine, science, or art of floating in the air, as by means of a balloon.

Aeronautism (ā'ėr-ō-nąt-izm), n. The practice of ascending and floating in the atmosphere, as in balloons.

Aerophane (ā'ėr-ō-fān), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and phanos, light, bright.] A light kind of gauze or imitation crape. E. H. Knight.

Aerophobia (ā'ėr-ō-fō"bi-a), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and phobos, fear.] A dread of air, that is, of a current of air: a symptom common in cases of hydrophobia, and occasionally observed in other diseases.

Aerophyte (ā'ėr-ō-fīt), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and phyton, a plant.] A plant which lives exclusively in air, absorbing all its food from it alone, as some orchids and bromelias; an aerial plant. See EPIPHYTE.

Aeroscepsy, Aeroscopy (ā'ėr-ō-skep"si, ā-ėr-os'ko-pi), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and skopeō, to explore.] 1. The investigation or observation of the state and variations of the atmosphere.—2. The faculty of perception by the medium of the air, supposed to reside in the antennæ of insects.

Aerosite (ā'ėr-ō-sit), n. Dark red silver ore; pyrargyrite.

Aerosphere (ā'ėr-ō-sfēr), n. Same as Atmosphere.

Aerostat (ā'ėr-ō-stat), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and statos, sustaining, from histēmi, to stand.] A machine or vessel sustaining weights in the air; a name given to air-balloons.

Aerostatic, Aerostatical (ā'ėr-ō-stat"ik, ā'ėr-ō-stat"ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to aerostatics.—2. Pertaining to aerostation, or the art of aerial navigation.—Aerostatic press, a machine for extracting the colouring matter from dye-stuffs. It consists of a box divided in the centre by a perforated plate. On this the dye-stuff is placed, and a second plate similarly pierced is placed above it. The extracting liquor is poured on the top, and on the air being exhausted from the under part of the vessel the liquor is forced through the substance by atmospheric pressure.—Aerostatic balance, an instrument, on the principle of the barometer, for ascertaining the weight of the air.

Aerostatics (ā'ėr-ō-stat"iks), n. 1. The science which treats of the weight, pressure, and equilibrium of air and other elastic fluids, and of the equilibrium of bodies sustained in them.—2. Aerostation (which see).

Aerostation (ā'ėr-ō-stā"shon), n. 1. Aerial navigation; the science of raising, suspending, and guiding machines in the air, or of ascending in air-balloons.—2. The science of aerostatics. [Rare.]

Aero-steam Engine (ā'ėr-ō-stēm" en-jin), n. [Gr. aēr, air, and E. steam-engine.] An engine in which the expansive power of combined heated air and steam is used in driving a piston. E. H. Knight.

Æruginous, Ærugineous (ē-rō'jin-us, ē-rō-jin'ē-us), a. [L. æruginosus, from ærugo, rust of copper.] 1. Partaking of verdigris or the rust of copper, or pertaining to that substance.—2. Resembling verdigris in appearance.

Deut. i. 22.

6. Anywhere else; in any other place.

There is not in the world again such a spring and seminary of brave military people as in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Bacon.

[The general idea involved in this word is that of return or repetition; as in these phrases—give it back again; give him as much again, that is, the same quantity once more or repeated, &c. There is an idiomatic use of the word in such phrases as, he struck it till it rung again, implying energy on the part of the subject or actor, and reciprocal action or return on that of the object.

He laughed till the glasses on the sideboard rang again. Dickens.]

—Again and again, often; with frequent repetition.

This is not to be obtained by one or two hasty readings; it must be repeated again and again. Locke.

Agaric (a-gar'ik), n. [Gr. agarikon, a fungus used as tinder, from Agaria, according to Dioscorides, a town of Sarmatia, where this fungus abounded.] One of the fungi that form the genus Agaricus. By the old herbalists the name had a wider range, including the corky forms growing on trunks of trees, like the 'female agaric' (Polyporus officinalis), to which the word was originally applied. See AGARICUS and POLYPORUS.—Agaric mineral, mountain-milk, or mountain-meal, one of the purest of the native carbonates of lime, found chiefly in the clefts of rocks and at the bottom of some lakes in a loose or semi-indurated form resembling a fungus. The name is also applied to a stone of loose consistence found in Tuscany, of which bricks may be made so light as to float in water, and of which the ancients are supposed to have made their floating bricks. It is a hydrated silicate of magnesium, mixed with lime, alumina, and a small quantity of iron.

Agaricia (a-ga-rish'i-a), n. [From Agaricus, a genus of fungi.] The mushroom madrepore, a genus of coral madrepores, so named from their resemblance to mushrooms.

Agaricini (a-gär'i-sī"nī), n. pl. A group of fungi having the fruit-bearing surface arranged in radiating gills, as in the mushrooms and toad-stools.

Agaricus (a-gar'ik-us), n. [See AGARIC.] A large and important genus of fungi, characterized by having a fleshy cap or pileus, and a number of radiating plates or gills on which are produced the naked spores. The majority of this species are furnished with stems, but some are attached to the objects on which they grow by their pileus. Over a thousand species are known, and are arranged in five sections according as the colour of their spores is white, pink, brown, purple, or black. Many of the species are edible like the common mushroom (A. campestris), and supply a delicious article of food, while others are deleterious and even poisonous. See MUSHROOM.

Agast, See AGHAST.

Agastric (a-gas'trik), a. [Gr. a, without, and gastēr, gastros, belly.] Without a stomach or proper intestinal canal, as the tape-worm.

Agate (a-gāt'), adv. [Prefix a, on, and gate, a road, a way. See GATE.] On the way; going; agoing; in motion. 'Set him agate again.' Old play. 'Set the bells agate.' Cotgrave. [Old and Provincial English and Scotch.]

Agate (ag'āt), n. [Fr. agate; L. achates, because found near a river of that name in Sicily.] 1. A siliceous semi-pellucid compound mineral, consisting of bands or layers of various colours blended together, the base generally being chalcedony, and this mixed with variable proportions of jasper, amethyst, quartz, opal, heliotrope, and carnelian. The varying manner in which these materials are arranged causes the agate when polished to assume some characteristic appearances, and thus certain varieties are distinguished, as the ribbon agate, the fortification agate, the zone agate, the star agate, the moss agate, the clouded agate, &c. In some agates vegetable or animal remains have been observed imbedded. Agate is chiefly found in trap-rocks and serpentine, often in the form of nodules, called geodes. Agates are esteemed the least valuable of the precious stones. They are cut and polished in large quantities at Oberstein in Saxony, where also artificial means are used to produce striking varieties of colour in these stones. In Scotland also they are cut and polished, under the name of Scotch pebbles. They are used for rings, seals, cups, beads, boxes, handles of small utensils, &c. Agate is used by Shakspere as a symbol of littleness or smallness, from the little figures cut in these stones when set in rings.

> I was never manned with an agate till now.
> 2 Henry IV. act 1, sc. 2.

2. An instrument used by gold-wire drawers, so called from the agate in the middle of it. 3. Naut. the cap for the pivots of the compass-cards, so named because formed of a hard siliceous stone, a chalcedony or carnelian, &c.—4. In printing, a kind of type, called also Ruby (which see).

Agave (a-gā'vē), n. [Gr. agauos, noble.] A genus of plants, nat. order Amaryllidaceæ, comprehending the American aloe. The plants are generally large, and have a massive tuft of fleshy leaves with a spiny apex. They live for many years—ten to seventy—before flowering. When this takes place the tall flowering stem springs from the centre of the tuft of leaves, and grows very rapidly until it reaches a height of 15, 20, or even 40 feet, bearing towards the end a large number of flowers. The best-known species is A. americana, which was introduced into Europe in 1561. This yields many important products. The sap, obtained in abundance from the plant when the flowering stem is just ready to burst forth, produces, when fermented, a beverage resembling cider, called by the Mexicans pulque. The fibres of the leaves are formed into thread and ropes, and an extract of the leaves is used as a substitute for soap; the flower-stem, when withered, is cut up into slices to form razor-strops.

Agazed† (a-gāzd'), pp. or a. [This may be either a word independently formed from prefix a, on or at, and the noun gaze=at gaze, or simply another form of agast, aghast, modified by the influence and somewhat similar meaning of gaze. See AGHAST.] Gazing with astonishment.

The French exclaim'd the devil was in arms;
All the whole army stood agazed on him. Shak.

Age (āj), n. [Fr. âge; O.Fr. eage, and edage, age, through rustic or L.L. ætaticum, from L. ætas, ætatis, an abbrev. of ævitas, from ævum, life-time, age, which word is really the same as the Gr. αἰ(f)ών, life-time, eternity, and allied to aei, ever; Skr. áy, in áyus, life, and also to E. aye. Eternal is also from ævum.] 1. A period of time representing the whole or a part of the duration of any individual thing or being; the time during which an individual has existed or may exist; as, the age of a man; the age of a plant; the age of the world, or of a rock; my age is twenty years.

Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age. Luke iii. 23.

2. The latter part of life or long-continued duration; the lapse of time, especially as affecting a person's physical powers; the state of being old; oldness.

The eyes of Israel were dim for age. Gen. xlviii. 10.
Age cannot wither her, nor custom stale
Her infinite variety. Shak.

3. One of those periods or stages of development into which human life may be divided, as marked by certain characteristics; time of life; as, life is divided into four ages, infancy, youth, manhood, and old age.

All the world's a stage,
And all the men and women merely players;
They have their exits and their entrances,
And one man in his time plays many parts,
His acts being seven ages. Shak.

4. The state of having arrived at maturity; mature years; maturity.

He is of age, ask him. Jn. ix. 21.

5. Specifically, the completion of the first twenty-one years of one's life, at which time one is legally master of his actions; as, he is of age; to come of age; to be under age: also called full age, before which time a person is called an infant.

A male at twelve years old may take the oath of allegiance, at fourteen is at years of discretion, so far, at least, that he may enter into a binding marriage, or consent or disagree to one contracted before, and at twenty-one he is at his own disposal, and may alien his lands, goods, and chattels. . . . Full age in male or female is twenty-one years, which age is completed on the day preceding the twenty-first anniversary of a person's birth. Wharton.

6. A particular period of history, as distinguished from others; a historical epoch; as, the golden age; the age of heroes or of chivalry.

The age of chivalry is gone. Burke.
Intent on her, who rapt in glorious dreams,
The second-sight of some Astræan age,
Sat compass'd with professors. Tennyson.

The Homeric poems may be regarded by the student of history as great pictures of political and social life, illustrating the whole variety of Greek experience down to the close of that age which saw the tides of Æolic, Ionic, and Doric migration flow from the west to the east of the Ægean. Prof. Febb.

The age is often used of the present as a historical period; the times we live in; as, to fully understand the spirit of the age. As regards the periods fancifully spoken of as the golden, the silver, and the iron age, see under these adjectives.—7. The people who live at a particular period; hence, a generation and a succession of generations; as, ages yet unborn. 'The mystery hid from ages.' Col. i. 26.—8. A century; the period of one hundred years.

Henry . . . justly and candidly apologizes for these five ages. Hallam.

9. Great length of time; protracted period; as, I haven't seen you for an age. 'Tomorrow, and that's an age away.' Tennyson. 10. Old people generally.

The hawthorn bush, with seats beneath the shade,
For talking age and whispering lovers made.
Goldsmith.

—Age of the moon, the time elapsed since her last conjunction with the sun.—Geologic age, or period, one of those divisions or periods into which geologic time has been classified according to the prevalence of certain animal or vegetable forms, and the comparative antiquity or recentness of organic remains in the strata; as, the mesozoic age, the age of reptiles, &c.—The Archæological Ages or Periods are three—the Stone Age, the Bronze Age, and the Iron Age, these names being given in accordance with the materials employed for weapons, implements, &c., during the particular period. The Stone Age has been subdivided into two—the Palæolithic and Neolithic. (See these words.) The word age in this sense has no reference to the lapse of time, but simply denotes the stage at which a people has arrived in its progress towards civilization. There are tribes yet in their stone age. Neither do the more primitive implements necessarily disappear on the appearance of those of a more advanced stage, stone implements being yet to some extent employed in Britain. The phrase Stone Age, therefore, merely marks the period before the use of bronze, and Bronze Age that before the employment of iron, among any specific people.—SYN. Time, period, generation, date, era, epoch, maturity, ripeness.

Age (āj), v.i. To grow old; to assume the appearance of old age; as, he ages rapidly.

I am aging; that is, I have a whitish, or rather a light-coloured hair here and there. Landor.

Age (āj), v.t. To leave to the influence of time; to bring to maturity, or to a state fit for use; to give the character of age or ripeness to; as, to age wine; to age clay, &c.

Aged (āj'ed), a. 1. Old; having lived long; having lived almost the usual time allotted to that species of being: applied to animals or plants; as, an aged man, or an aged oak. 2. Having a certain age; having lived; as, a man aged forty years.

Agedly (āj'ed-li), adv. Like an aged person.

Agedness (āj'ed-nes), n. The state or condition of being old; oldness.

Custom without truth is but agedness of error. Milton.

Agee (a-jē'), adv. Same as Ajee.

Ageless (āj'les), a. Without age; without definite limits of existence.

Agen † (a-gen'), adv. Again.

Borne far asunder by the tides of men,
Like adamant and steel they meet agen. Dryden.

Agency (ā'jen-si), n. [L.L. agentia, from L. agens, ppr. of ago, to act. See ACT.] 1. The state of being in action or of exerting power; action; operation; instrumentality. 'The agency of providence in the natural world.' Woodward.—2. The office of an agent or factor; business of an agent intrusted with the concerns of another; as, the principal pays the charges of agency.

Agend (ā'jend), n. [Contr. for L. agendum.] Something that is to be done; specifically in theol. a thing to be done, in contradistinction to a thing to be believed. See AGENDUM, 1.

For the matter of our worship, our credends, our agends are all according to the rule. Wilcock.

Agendum (a-jen'dum), n. pl. Agenda (a-jen'da). [L. from ago, to do.] 1. Something to be done, transacted, or attended to; an item of business coming before a meeting; in theol. a duty. 'The moral and religious credenda and agenda of any good man.' Coleridge.—2. pl. used as sing. (a) Memoranda; a memorandum-book. (b) A church service; a ritual or liturgy.

Agenesis (a-jen'e-sis), n. [Gr. a, priv., and genesis, generation.] In physiol. any anomaly of organization, consisting in absence or imperfect development of parts.

Agent (ā'jent), a. [L. agens, agentis, acting. See ACT.] Acting: opposed to patient, or sustaining action. 'The body agent.' Bacon. [Rare.]

Agent (ā'jent), n. [See the adjective.] 1. An actor; one that exerts power, or has the power to act; as, a moral agent.—2. An active power or cause; that which has the power to produce an effect; as, heat is a powerful agent. In physics, anything which has power to act upon something else is an agent; in chem. substances which occasion the decomposition of others, or produce a chemical change on other bodies, are called agents; in med. anything which affects or tends to affect the human body is called an agent.—3. A substitute, deputy, or factor; one intrusted with the business of another; an attorney, solicitor, or other representative of a person, the person represented being called the principal in relation to his agent.—Morbific agents, in med. causes of disease; therapeutic agents, the means of treating disease.—A voluntary or free agent is one that may do or not do any action, and has the conscious perception that his actions result from the exercise of his own will.—Agent and patient, in law, a person who is both the doer of a thing and the party to whom it is done; thus when a person who owes money to another dies and makes the creditor his executor the latter may retain out of the estate as much as satisfies his claim, and is thus said to be agent and patient.

Agential (ā-jen'shal), a. Pertaining to an agent or agency.

Agentship† (ā'jent-ship), n. The office of an agent; agency. Beau. & Fl.

Ageratum (a-jér'a-tum), n. [Gr. a, without, free from, and geras, geratos, old age.] A genus of plants, nat. order Compositæ. A. mexicanum is a well-known flower-border annual, 1½ foot high, with dense lavender-blue heads, which keep their colour long.

Ageustia (a-gūs'ti-a), n. [Gr. a, priv., and geuomai, to taste.] In med. a defect or loss of taste, often seen in colds and fevers, or from palsy of the tongue.

Aggelation† (a-jel-ā'shon), n. [L.L. aggelatio, aggelationis—L. ag for ad, to, and gelo, gelatum, to freeze, from gelu, ice.] Concretion of a fluid into ice. Sir T. Browne.

Aggeneration † (a-jen'ér-ā''shon), n. [L. ag for ad, to, and E. generation.] The state of becoming absorbed in and so as to form part of another substance. Sir T. Browne.

Agger (aj'ér), n. [L., from ad, to, and gero, to carry.] A Latin term signifying an earth-work or any artificial mound or rampart made use of in the attack and defence of a military position.

Aggeration (aj-ér-ā'shon), n. A heaping; accumulation. 'Aggerations of sand.' Ray. [Rare.]

Aggerose (aj'ér-ōs), a. In heaps, or formed in heaps. Dana.

Aggest† (ad-jest'), v.t. [L. aggero, aggestum—ag for ad, to, and gero, to carry.] To heap up.

The violence of the waters aggested the earth. Fuller.

Agglomerate (ag-glom'ér-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. agglomerated; ppr. agglomerating. [L. agglomero—ad, and glomero, to wind into a ball, from glomus, a ball of yarn, kindred with globus, a globe.] To collect or gather into a mass. 'In one agglomerated cluster hung.' Young.

Agglomerate (ag-glom'ér-āt), v.i. To gather, grow, or collect into a ball or mass. 'Hard, agglomerating salts.' Thomson.

Agglomerate (ag-glom'ér-āt), n. In geol. a collective name for masses consisting of angular fragments ejected from volcanoes: when the mass consists of fragments worn and rounded by water it is called a conglomerate. Called also Coarse Ash.

Agglomerate, Agglomerated (ag-glom'ér-āt, ag-glom'ér-āt-ed), a. Gathered into a ball or mass; specifically, in bot. collected into a head, as the stamens in Anona or Magnolia, or the male flowers in a pine-tree.

Agglomeration (ag-glom'ér-ā''shon), n. 1. The act of agglomerating or state of being agglomerated; the state of being gathered into a ball or mass.—2. That which is agglomerated; a collection; a heap.

Agglomerative (ag-glom'ér-āt-iv), a. Disposed or having a tendency to gather together or collect.

Taylor is eminently discursive, accumulative, and (to use one of his own words) agglomerative. Coleridge.

Agglutinant (ag-glū'tin-ant), n. Any viscous substance which agglutinates or unites other substances by causing an adhesion; any application which tends to unite parts which have too little adhesion.

Agglutinant (ag-glū'tin-ant), a. Uniting as glue; tending to cause adhesion. 'Something strengthening and agglutinant.' Gray.

Agglutinate (ag-glū'tin-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. agglutinated; ppr. agglutinating. [L. agglutino—ad, and glutino, from gluten, glue. See GLUE.] To unite or cause to adhere, as with glue or other viscous substance; to unite by causing an adhesion of substances.

Agglutinate (ag-glū'tin-āt), a. United as by glue; joined.—Agglutinate languages, languages in the second stage of development, or that midway between the monosyllabic and inflectional stages. The suffixes for inflection are glued to the root, but retain a kind of independence, and are felt to be distinct from the body of the word; the root stands at the head of the word and undergoes no modification, while the suffixes often undergo vowel modification by what has been called the law of harmony, every such ending having two forms, one with a heavy vowel and another with a light, these forms being employed in conformity with the character of the vowel in the root. thus, from Turk. baba, father, we have babalar-um-dan, from our fathers, but from dedeh, grandfather, dede-ler-in-den, from their grandfathers. Called also Agglutinative, Agglutinating, Polysynthetic, or Terminational Languages.

Agglutinating (ag-glū'tin-āt-ing), a. In philol. characterized by agglutination; agglutinate. See AGGLUTINATE, a.

Agglutination (ag-glū'tin-ā''shon), n. 1. The act of uniting by glue or other tenacious substance; the state of being thus united; adhesion of parts. —2. In philol. the most characteristic feature of the Turanian languages, consisting in a union of formative elements with roots in such a way that both retain a kind of semi-independence and the root is never obscured. See AGGLUTINATE, a.

In the Aryan languages the modifications of words, comprised under declension and conjugation, were likewise originally expressed by agglutination. But the component parts began soon to coalesce, so as to form one integral word, liable in its turn to phonetic corruption to such an extent that it became impossible, after a time to decide which was the root and which the modificatory element. Max Müller.

Agglutinative (ag-glū'tin-āt-iv), a. 1. Tending or having power to agglutinate or unite; having power to cause adhesion; as, an agglutinative substance.—2. In philol. exhibiting or characterized by the formative process known as agglutination; agglutinate; as, an agglutinative language.

There was a very good reason why the Turanian languages should have remained in this second or agglutinative stage. It was felt essential that the radical portion of each word should stand out in distinct relief and never be obscured or absorbed, as happens in the third or inflectional stage. Max Müller.

Aggrace† (ag-grās'), v.t. 1. To show grace or favour to. Spenser.—2. To make beautiful or graceful.

And that which all faire workes doth most aggrace,
The art which all that wrought appeared in no place.
Spenser.

Aggrace† (ag-grās'), n. Kindness; favour. 'Courteous aggrace.' Spenser.

Aggrandizable (ag'gran-dīz-a-bl), a. Capable of being aggrandized.

Aggrandization (ag'gran-dīz-ā''shon), n. The act of aggrandizing.

No part of the body will consume by the aggrandization of the other, but all motions will be orderly, and a just distribution be to all parts. Waterhouse.

Aggrandize (ag'gran-dīz), v.t. pret. & pp. aggrandized; ppr. aggrandizing. [Fr. agrandir—L. prefix ag for ad, to, and grandis, grand.] 1. To make great or greater in power, wealth, rank, or honour; to exalt; as, to aggrandize a family. 'His scheme for aggrandizing his son.' Prescott.—2.† To magnify or exaggerate.

If we trust to fame and reports these may proceed . . . from small matters aggrandized. Wollaston.

3. To widen the scope of; to enlarge, extend, or elevate.

These furnish us with glorious springs and mediums to raise and aggrandize our conceptions. Watts.

4.† To increase. 'Aggrandize their tortures.' Sir T. Herbert.—SYN. To augment, exalt, promote, prefer, advance, enlarge, increase.

Aggrandize (ag'gran-dīz), v.i. To grow or become greater. 'Follies, continued till old age, do aggrandize and become horrid.' Bp. Hall. [Rare.]

Aggrandizement (ag'gran-dīz-ment), n. The act of aggrandizing; the state of being exalted in power, rank, or honour; exaltation; enlargement; as, the emperor seeks only the aggrandizement of his own family.

The chief movers and mainsprings were the papal and the imperial powers; the aggrandizement or diminution of which has been the drift of almost all the politics, intrigues, and wars which have employed and distracted Europe to this day. Burke.

SYN. Augmentation, exaltation, enlargement, advancement, promotion, preferment.

Aggrandizer (ag'gran-dīz-ėr), n. One that aggrandizes or exalts in power, rank, or honour.

Each one sought his lady to aggrate. Spenser.

Aggravable† (ag'gra-va-bl), a. Calculated to aggravate; capable of aggravating.

This idolatry is the more discernible and aggravable in the invocation of saints and idols. Dr. H. More.

Aggravate (ag'gra-vāt), v.t. pret. & pp. aggravated; ppr. aggravating. [L. aggravo—ad, and gravis, heavy, whence grave, grief, &c.] 1.† To add to; to increase.

Ford's a knave, and I will aggravate his style (that is, add to his titles): thou, Master Brook, shalt know him for a knave and cuckold. Shak.

Then, soul, live thou upon thy servant's loss,
And let that pine to aggravate thy store. Shak.

2. To make worse, more severe, or less tolerable; to make more enormous, or less excusable; to intensify; as, to aggravate the evils of life; to aggravate pain or punishment. 'To aggravate the horrors of the scene.' Prescott.—3. To exaggerate; to give colouring to in description; to give an exaggerated representation of; as, to aggravate circumstances.—4. To provoke; to irritate; to tease. [Colloq.]

I was so aggravated that I almost doubt if I did know. Dickens.

SYN. To heighten, raise, make worse, increase, magnify, exaggerate, tease, irritate.

Aggravating (ag'gra-vāt-ing), p. and a. 1. Provoking; annoying: colloquially applied to persons as well as things; as, he is an aggravating fellow. 'Which makes it only the more aggravating.' Thackeray.—2. In law, making worse or more heinous; as, aggravating circumstances.

Aggravatingly (ag'gra-vāt-ing-li), adv. In an aggravating manner.

Aggravation (ag-gra-vā'shon), n. 1. The act of making worse: used of evils, physical or moral; hence, the act of increasing severity or heinousness; addition to that which is evil or improper; as, an aggravation of pain, grief, or crime.—2. Exaggeration in a representation; heightened description.

Accordingly they got a painter by the knight's directions to add a pair of whiskers to the face, and by a little aggravation of the features to change it into the Saracen's Head. Addison.

3. Provocation; irritation. Dickens. [Colloq.]

Aggregate (ag'grē-gāt), v.t. pret. & pp. aggregated; ppr. aggregating. [L. aggrego, aggregatum, to collect in troops—ad, and grex, gregis, a herd or band, whence gregarious.] To bring together; to collect into a sum, mass, or body. 'The aggregated soil.' Milton.

Aggregate (ag'grē-gāt), a. Formed by the conjunction or collection of particulars into a whole mass or sum; total; as, the aggregate amount of charges.

In making bread, for example, the labour employed about the thing itself is that of the baker; but the labour of the miller, though employed directly in the production, not of bread but of flour, is equally part of the aggregate sum of labour by which the bread is produced. J. S. Mill.

Specifically, (a) in geol. composed of several different mineral constituents capable of being separated by mechanical means; as, granite is an aggregate rock. (b) In anat. formed into clusters; as, aggregate glands, those which are clustered together, as the tonsils, the salivary, pancreatic, and mammary glands. (c) In bot. composed of many small florets having a common undivided receptacle, the anthers being distinct and separate, the florets commonly standing on stalks, and each having a partial calyx: said of flowers.—Corporation aggregate, in law, see under CORPORATION.

Aggregate (ag'grē-gāt), n. A sum, mass, or assemblage of particulars; as, a house is an aggregate of stones, brick, timber, &c.: it differs from a compound in this, that the particulars of an aggregate are less intimately mixed than in a compound. 'Some aggregate whose units are partially independent.' H. Spencer.—In the aggregate, taken altogether; considered as a whole; collectively.

Our judgment of a man's character is derived from observing a number of successive acts, forming in the aggregate his general course of conduct. Sir G. C. Lewis.

Aggregately (ag'grē-gāt-li), adv. Collectively; taken in a sum or mass.

Many little things, though separately they seem too insignificant to mention, yet aggregately are too material for me to omit. Chesterfield.

Aggregation (ag-grē-gā'shon), n. 1. The act of aggregating; the state of being collected into a sum or mass.

Each genus is made up by the aggregation of species. Carpenter.

Aggregator (ag'grē-gāt-ėr), n. One who collects into a whole or mass. Burton.

Aggress (ag-gres'), v.i. [L. aggredior, aggressus—ad, and gradior, to go, gradus, a step, whence grade, degree, &c.] To make a first attack; to commit the first act of hostility or offence; to begin a quarrel or controversy; to be first to assault or invade.

Tell aggressing France
How Britain's sons and Britain's friends can fight. Prior.

Aggress (ag-gres'), v.t. To attack. Quart. Rev. [Rare.]

Aggress† (ag-gres'), n. Aggression; attack. 'Military aggresses upon others.' Sir M. Hale.

Aggression (ag-gre'shon), n. The first attack or act of hostility; the first act of injury, or first act leading to a war or controversy; as, to make an aggression. 'Aggressions of power.' Hallam.—SYN. Attack, invasion, assault, encroachment, injury, offence.

Aggressive (ag-gres'iv), a. Characterized by aggression; tending to aggress; prone to begin a quarrel; making the first attack; as, the minister pursued an aggressive foreign policy.

That which would be violent if aggressive, might be justified if defensive. Sir W. Scott.

Aggressiveness (ag-gres'iv-nes), n. The quality of being aggressive.

Aggressor (ag-gres'ėr), n. The person who first attacks; he who first commences hostility or a quarrel; an assaulter; an invader.

The insolence of the aggressor is usually proportioned to the tameness of the sufferer. Ames.

Aggrievance, Agrievance (ag-grēv'ans), n. [See AGGRIEVE.] Oppression; hardship; injury; grievance. 'Agrievances late urged against you by your mother.' Beau. & Fl. [Rare.]

Aggrieve (ag-grēv'), v.t. pret. & pp. aggrieved; ppr. aggrieving. [O.Fr. agrever, to weigh down, from grever, to oppress, from L. gravis, heavy, whence also grief, grave, aggravate, &c.] 1. To give pain or sorrow; to afflict; to grieve. 'Which yet aggrieves my heart.' Spenser.—2. To bear hard upon; to oppress or injure in one's rights; to vex or harass by civil or political injustice.

The two races, so long hostile, soon found that they had common interests and common enemies. Both were alike aggrieved by the tyranny of a bad king. Macaulay.

Aggrieve† (ag-grēv'), v.i. To mourn; to lament.

My heart aggriev'd that such a wretch should reign. Mir. for Mags.

Aggroup (ag-gröp'), v.t. [Prefix ag for ad, to, and group.] To bring together; to group; to collect many persons in a crowd, or many figures into a whole, in statuary, painting, or description.

Bodies of divers natures which are aggrouped (or combined) together are agreeable and pleasant to the sight. Dryden.

Agha (ä'ga). See AGA.

Aghanee (ag-hä'nē), n. [Hind. aghani, the produce of the month Aghan, the eighth in the Hindu year, answering to the last half of November and the first half of December.] The name given to the chief rice crop in Hindustan. It is the middle of the three crops, being laid down along with the Bhadoee crop in April and May, and reaped in November and December. Called Amun in lower Bengal.

Aghast (a-gast'), a. or p. [From prefix a, intens., and stem seen in Goth. gaisjan, us-gaisjan, to terrify, us-geisnan, to be astonished, Icel. geiski, panic, Dan. gyse, to shudder; comp. also O. or Prov. E. gast, gaster, to terrify, gast, fear, gastness, gastful.] Struck with amazement; stupefied with sudden fright or horror. Written also agast, which is etymologically the better spelling.

Aghast he waked, and starting from his bed,
Cold sweat in clammy drops his limbs o'erspread.
Dryden.

[Formerly aghast might be used as a present, a preterite, or an infinitive. 'Or other grisly thing that him aghast.' Spenser. 'This hond, that Balthasar so sore agaste.' Chaucer.

'Now dere suster myn, what may it be
That me agasteth in my dream?' quod she.
Chaucer.

Followed by a reflexive pronoun it might have a passive meaning.

The rynges on the temple dore that honge,
And eek the dores, clatereden ful faste,
Of which Arcita somwhat hym agaste. Chaucer.]

Agible† (aj'i-bl), a. [L. ago, to do.] Capable of being done; doable. 'When they were fit for agible things.' Sir A. Shirley.

2. With a thing or things for the subject, in which case agree now takes no preposition except with after it, though formerly to was also so used. (a) To be consistent; to harmonize; not to contradict or be repugnant; as, this story agrees with what has been related by others.

Their witness agreed not together. Mark xiv. 56.

When we possess ourselves with the utmost security of the demonstration, that the three angles of a triangle are equal to two right ones, what do we more but perceive, that equality to two right ones does necessarily agree to, and is inseparable from the three angles of a triangle. Locke.

All these qualities agree just as well to the oak, against which he contends. Bp. Lowth.

(b) To resemble; to be similar; to be applicable or appropriate; to tally; to match; to correspond; as, the picture does not agree with the original. (c) To suit; to be accommodated or adapted; as, the same food does not agree with every constitution. (d) In gram. to correspond in number, case, gender, or person; as, a verb must agree with its nominative. [In certain phrases the verb to agree is still conjugated, like some other intransitive verbs, with the auxiliary to be instead of have, which gives these phrases, to be agreed, all are agreed, and the like, the appearance of being in the passive. 'The traitors are agreed' (that is, the traitors have agreed, have or are come to an agreement). Shak.]

Agree (a-grē'), v.t. To settle; to determine; to arrange.

He saw from far . . . . .
Some troublous uprore or contentious fray,
Whereto he drew in haste it to agree. Spenser.

I do believe the two Pretenders had, privately, agreed the matter beforehand. Gray.

[This use of the verb agree is now obsolete except in the passive in the phrase it is agreed.

It is thus agreed
That peaceful truce shall be proclaimed in France. Shak.]

Ah (ä). [A natural cry expressive of sudden emotion; comp. G. ach, L. ah, Gr. a, ā, Skr. á, áh, ah.] An exclamation expressive of pain, surprise, pity, compassion, complaint, contempt, dislike, joy, exultation, &c., according to the manner of utterance.

Aha (ä-hä'). [A lengthened form of ah, or formed of ah and ha; comp. G. aha, Skr. ahō, ahaha.] An exclamation expressing triumph, contempt, or simple surprise; but the senses are distinguished by very different modes of utterance, and different modifications of features. Ps. xxxv. 21.

Aha (ä'hä), n. [See HA-HA.] A sunk fence, not visible without near approach. More commonly spelled Ha-ha or Hah-hah.

Ahead (a-hed'), adv. [Prefix a, on, at, and head.] 1. Headlong; without restraint; head foremost.

> It is mightily the fault of parents, guardians, tutors, and governors, that so many men miscarry. They suffer them at first to run ahead, and when perverse inclinations are advanced into habits, there is no dealing with them. Sir R. L'Estrange.

2. In or to the front; in advance; before; as, they walked ahead of us all the way; he soon ran ahead of us; specifically (naut.), before or in front of a vessel, or in the direction to which a vessel's head is directed; farther forward: in opposition to astern; as, to lie ahead; to move ahead.

> The east end of the island bore but a little ahead of us. Fielding.

—To run ahead of one's reckoning (naut.), to sail beyond the places erroneously estimated in the dead-reckoning as the ship's station.—To go ahead, a colloquial phrase signifying to push forward; to proceed with the matter one is engaged in; to show one's self active: generally used, as an admonition, in the imperative mood, 'go ahead'; and not rarely as an adjective; as, a go-ahead person (one who is energetic or enterprising).

Aheap (a-hēp'), a. or adv. [Apparently from prefix a, on or in, and heap; but possibly the word, in first extract at any rate, is really another form of the O.E. awhape, to astonish. See AWHAPE.] 1. In a quiver or tremble with terror; having received a shock of fear.

> When some fresh bruit
> Startled me all aheap! and soon I saw
> The horridest shape that ever raised my awe.
> Hood.

To direct a missile towards an object.—2. To point to in a figurative sense; to direct the mind to an object; specifically, (a) to guess; to conjecture.

In sadness, cousin, I do love a woman.—
I aimed so near, when I supposed you loved.
Shak.

[Formerly common, but now rare in this sense.] (b) To direct the intention or purpose; to attempt to reach or accomplish; to tend toward; to endeavour; as, a man aims at distinction, or aims to be rich: in all its senses followed by at before the object where the object is expressed.—To cry aim, in archery, to encourage the archers by crying out aim when they were about to shoot. Hence it came to mean to applaud or encourage in a general sense.

It ill beseems this presence to cry aim
To these ill-tuned repetitions. Shak.

Aim (ām), v.t. To direct or point to a particular object; to level at; as, to aim a musket or an arrow, the fist or a blow; to aim a satire or a reflection at some person or vice.

Aim (ām), n. 1. The pointing or directing of a missile; the direction of anything to a particular point or object with a view to strike or affect it, as a spear, a blow, a discourse or remark.

Each at head levelled his deadly aim. Milton.

2.† The direction in which a missile is pointed; the line of shot; hence, fig. the direction in which anything tends.

And when the cross blue lightning seem'd to open
The breast of heaven, I did present myself
Even in the aim and very flash of it. Shak.

3. The point intended to be hit, or object intended to be effected; the mark. 'To be the aim of every dangerous shot.' Shak.—4. A purpose; intention; design; scheme; as, men are often disappointed of their aim.

But see, how oft ambitious aims are crost. Pope.

5.† Conjecture; guess.

He that seeth no mark, must shoot by aim. Bp. Jewel.
It is impossible by aim to tell it. Spenser.

—To give aim, in archery, to stand near the butts to tell the archers where their arrows alight. The terms are 'wide on the shaft (right) hand;' 'wide on the bow (left) hand;' 'short;' 'gone;' the distances being measured by bow-lengths. See BOW-HAND.—SYN. End, object, scope, drift, design, purpose, intention, scheme.

Aim-crier† (ām'krī-ėr), n. 1. One who encouraged an archer by crying aim when he was about to shoot. Hence—2. An encourager generally; an approving on-looker; an abettor. 'Thou smiling aim-crier at princes' fall.' Markham.

Aimer (ām'ėr), n. One that aims.

Aim-frontlet (ām'frunt-let), n. A piece of wood fitted to the muzzle of a gun so as to make it level with the breech, formerly in use among gunners. E. H. Knight.

Ainsell (ān'sel), n. Ownself. [Scotch.]

Ain't, An't (ānt). A vulgar corruption of are not; sometimes also used for is not and am not.

Air (ār), n. [Fr. air, Pr. air, aire, L. aër, Gr. aēr, air.] 1. The fluid which we breathe. Air is inodorous, invisible, insipid, colourless, elastic, possessed of gravity, easily moved, rarefied, and condensed, essential to respiration and combustion, and the medium of sounds. Atmospheric air is composed by volume of 20 or 21 oxygen and 80 or 79 nitrogen; by weight, of 23 oxygen to 77 nitrogen. These gases are not chemically united, but mixed mechanically. Air contains also $\frac{4}{10000}$ of carbonic acid, aqueous vapour, and varying proportions of ammonia, nitric acid, ozone, and organic matter. The body of air surrounding the earth is called the atmosphere. The specific gravity of the air is to that of water nearly as 1 to 828, and 1000 cubic inches at mean temperature and pressure weigh $30\frac{5}{8}$ grains. Air is necessary to life; being inhaled into the lungs, the oxygen is separated from the nitrogen, and it is supposed to furnish the body with heat and animation. By the ancient philosophers air was considered one of the four elements.—2.† In chem. same as Gas; thus oxygen was called dephlogisticated air.—3. Air in motion; a light breeze. 'The summer airs blow cool.' Tennyson.—4.† Utterance abroad; publication; publicity.

You gave it air before me. Dryden.

Wind is used in like manner. Hence—5.† Intelligence; information; advice.

It grew from the airs which the princes and states abroad received from their ambassadors and agents here. Bacon.

6. In music, (a) a tune; a short song or piece of music adapted to words; also, the peculiar modulation of the notes which gives music its character; melody; as, a soft air. (b) A song or piece of poetry for singing; as, the air, 'Sound an Alarm.' (c) The soprano part in a harmonized piece of music.—7. Any piece of poetry. 'The repeated air of sad Electra's poet.' Milton. [Rare.]—8. The peculiar look, appearance, and bearing of a person; as, the air of a youth; a graceful air; a lofty air.—9. The general character or complexion of anything; appearance; semblance.

Too great liberties taken (in translation) in varying either the expression or composition, in order to give a new air to the whole, will be apt to have a very bad effect. Ep. Lowth.

As it was communicated with the air of a secret, it soon found its way into the world. Pope.

10. pl. An affected manner; manifestation of pride or vanity; assumed haughtiness: chiefly in the phrase to give one's self airs.

Mrs. Crackenbury read the paragraph in bitterness of spirit, and discoursed to her followers about the airs which that woman was giving herself. Thackeray.

11. pl. The artificial motions or carriage of a horse.—12. In painting, (a) that which expresses action; manner; gesture; attitude. (b) The representation of the effect of the atmospheric medium, through which natural objects are viewed.—To take the air, to go abroad; to walk or ride a little distance.—To take air,† to be divulged; to be made public; as, the story has taken air. Air is frequently found in composition, and as the compounds are in many cases words of obvious meaning, only those which have a peculiar or specific sense are entered below in alphabetical order.

Air (ār), v.t. 1. To expose to the air; to give access to the open air; to ventilate; as, to air clothes; to air a room. Hence—2. To expose ostentatiously; to display; to bring before public notice; as, to air one's views. 'Airing a snowy hand and signet ring.' Tennyson.—3. To expose to heat; to warm; as, to air linen; to air liquors.

Air, Ear (ār), a. and adv. Early. [Scotch.] 'An air winter's a sair winter.' Scotch proverb.

Aira (ār'a), n. [Greek name of a kind of darnel.] Hair-grass, a genus belonging to the nat. order Graminæ, characterized by two-flowered spikelets. The species are widely distributed in temperate regions, but few are of much value as fodder plants. A. cæspitosa (the tufted hair-grass) is from 2 to 4 feet high, growing in meadows and boggy heaths, where its tufts are useful as stepping-places. It affords a fine cover for game, and constitutes the bulk of bog-hay on moors. Its long, narrow, rough leaves wound the skin if drawn smartly across it.

Airable (ār'a-bl), a. Suitable to be sung. Howell. [Rare and obsolete.]

Air-balloon (ār-bal-lōn') n. See BALLOON.

Air-bath (ār'bath), n. 1. The exposure of the person to the action of the air, recommended by Dr. Franklin.—2. An arrangement for drying substances by exposing them to air of any temperature desired.

Air-bed (ār'bed), n. A bed made by inflating an air-tight bed-shaped bag with air.

Air-bladder (ār'blad-dėr), n. 1. A vesicle filled with air.

The pulmonary artery and vein pass along the surfaces of these air-bladders in an infinite number of ramifications. Arbuthnot.

2. A bag situated under the back-bone of certain fishes, and which, being full of air, is supposed to assist in breathing, and in regulating the buoyancy of the animal.

Air-bone (ār'bōn), n. A bone with a large cavity filled with air, as in birds. Owen.

Air-brake (ār'brāk), n. A railway brake applied by means of condensed atmospheric air.

Air-braving (ār'brāv-ing), a. Defying the influence of the air. 'Air-braving towers.' Shak.

Air-brick (ār'brik), n. An iron box, commonly made of the size and shape of a brick, and perforated with holes, placed in the walls of houses so as to facilitate the transmission of air, and thus promote ventilation.

Air-built (ār'bilt), a. Erected in the air; having no solid foundation; chimerical; as, an air-built castle; air-built hopes.

Air-cane (ār'kān), n. An air-gun fitted up in a walking-stick.

Air-casing (ār'kās-ing), n. An air-tight casing of sheet-iron around a pipe to prevent undue transmission of heat or cold; specifically, the casing round the base of the funnel of a steam-vessel, to prevent too great a transmission of heat to the deck.

Air-cell (ār'sel), n. In bot. one of the cavities in the leaves, stems, or other parts of plants, containing air. They are well seen in the bladders of sea-weeds, and are found in other aquatic plants, which they serve to float. Called also Air-chambers.—2. In anat. (a) the minute bronchial cells constituting the texture of the lungs, into which the air is conveyed by the ultimate ramifications of the windpipe, for the oxygenation of the blood; (b) the dilatations of the trachea or air-tube in insects forming the respiratory apparatus.

Air-cells in Gulf-weed (Sargassum vulgare).

Air-chamber (ār'chām-bėr), n. 1. Air-cell (which see).—2. A cavity in a hydraulic machine, such as a fire-engine, the air in which, on being compressed by the admission of water into the chamber, by its elastic force acts as a spring, and equalizes the flow of the liquid.

Air-condenser (ār-kon-dens'ėr), n. An apparatus for condensing air. It consists of a close vessel with a syringe attached to it, which is used for injecting air into the vessel until the requisite degree of condensation be produced.

Air-cone (ār'kōn), n. A cone in a marine-engine to receive the gases which enter the hot-well from the air-pump, whence, after ascending, they escape through a pipe at the top.

Air-course (ār'kōrs), n. A general name for the passages in a coal-mine intended for ventilation.

Air-cushion (ār'kush-on), n. A cushion made by inflating a bag with air.

Air-dew (ār'dū), n. Manna. [Rare.]

Air-drain (ār'drān), n. A cavity formed round the external walls of a building to prevent the earth from lying against them and causing dampness.

Air-drawn (ār'drạn), a. Drawn or depicted in the air. 'The air-drawn dagger.' Shak.

Air-drill (ār'dril), n. A drill driven by the pressure of condensed air. E. H. Knight.

Air-engine (ār'en-jin), n. An engine in which air, heated or compressed, is employed as the motive power. Condensed-air engines have been found to be the best and safest for working the rock-drill in mining operations, the waste air serving to ventilate the mine and reduce the oppressive heat.

Airer (ār'ėr), n. 1. One who airs, or exposes to the air.—2. A screen for drying clothes, &c.

Air-escape (ār'es-kāp), n. A contrivance for permitting air which has collected in water-pipes to escape.

Air-exhauster (ār'egz-hąst-ėr), n. 1. An air-trap by which collected air may escape from water-mains, &c.—2. A contrivance for removing exhausted air from any place intended to be ventilated.

Air-filter (ār'fil-tėr), n. A contrivance for filtering or purifying air. The common method is to make the air pass through a wire screen, and then expose the current to the action of water.

Air-fountain (ār'fount-ān), n. An apparatus for producing a jet of water by the elastic force of air compressed in a close vessel, and made to act on the surface of the water to be raised.

Air-funnel (ār'fun-nel), n. Naut. a cavity formed by the omission of a timber in the upper works of a vessel, to promote the ventilation of the hold.

Air-furnace (ār'fėr-nās), n. A term used to denote a furnace which has no blast, but only a natural draught.

Air-gas (ār'gas), n. An inflammable illuminating gas made by charging ordinary atmospheric air with the vapours of petroleum, naphtha, or some similar substance. The substance so used is called gasolene, and must be such as to evaporate with great readiness. It is placed in a vessel called a generator, where it is exposed to a current of air, and various contrivances are adopted to promote the evaporation, and prevent the too rapid cooling which the evaporation is liable to bring about.

Air-grating (ār'grāt-ing), n. A grating to admit air for ventilation.

Air-gun (ār'gun), n. A kind of gun in which highly-condensed air is used to project the ball. A common variety is shaped like a rifle or musket, a hollow spherical ball, into which air has been forced by a condensing syringe, being attached to it and serving as a reservoir for the condensed air. A portion of this air escapes into the barrel, by the opening of a valve, each time the trigger is drawn, so that it presses against the ball precisely in the same way as gunpowder. Air condensed to $\frac{1}{10}$th of its bulk gives about half the velocity of gunpowder.

Air-holder (ār'hōld-ėr), n. 1. A vessel for holding air for various purposes; as (a) for the purpose of counteracting the pressure of a decreasing column of mercury; (b) for the purpose of keeping up a moderate and steady current of air. In the latter case the air is contained in an inverted vessel which rises and falls in a tank of water, and has the air supplied to it by one pipe and carried off by another.—2. † A gasometer.

Air-hole (ār'hōl), n. 1. An opening to admit or discharge air.—2. In founding, a fault in a casting, caused by a bubble of air passing from a core outwards, and which is retained in the metal. Called also a Blow-hole.

Airily (ār'i-li), adv. In an airy manner; gaily.

> Fanny bade her father good-night, and whisked off airily. Dickens.

Airiness (ār'i-nes), n. 1. Exposure to a free current of air; openness to the air; as, the airiness of a country-seat.—2. Gaiety; levity; as, the airiness of young persons. 'A certain talkativeness and airiness in their (the French) tongue.' Sterne.

Airing (ār'ing), n. 1. An exposure to the air, or to a fire, for warming or drying.—2. Exercise in the open air; a short excursion.

Airing-stage (ār'ing-stāj), n. A platform on which powder is dried by exposure to sun and air.

Air-jacket (ār'jak-et), n. A jacket inflated with air, or to which bladders filled with air are fastened to render persons buoyant in water.

Airless (ār'les), a. Not open to a free current of air; wanting fresh air or communication with open air.

Air-level (ār'lev-el), n. A name sometimes given to a spirit-level (which see).

Airling† (ār'ling), n. A thoughtless, gay person.

> Slight airlings will be won with dogs and horses. B. Jonson.

Air-lock (ār'lok), n. An air-tight chamber in a caisson in which operations are being carried on under water, communicating by one door with the outer air and the main entrance shaft of the caisson, and by another door with the chambers filled with condensed air in which the men are at work. Before entering the latter chambers one must pass through the air-lock, where one remains until the air within it has been brought to the same degree of compression as that in the working chambers.

Air-machine (ār'ma-shēn), n. In mining, the apparatus by which pure air is forced into parts badly ventilated, and the foul air extracted.

Airn (ārn), n. Iron. [Scotch.]

Airo-hydrogen (ār-ō-hī'drō-jen), a. Pertaining to a mixture of atmospheric air and hydrogen.—Airo-hydrogen blowpipe, a blowpipe in which atmospheric air and hydrogen are burned together in order to produce an intense heat.

Airometer (ār-om'et-ėr), n. [Air, and Gr. metron, a measure.] Same as Air-holder (b).

Air-passage (ār'pas-āj), n. 1. In anat. one of the tubes by which air is admitted to the lungs, comprising the larynx, trachea, bronchial tubes, and their minute ramifications. 2. In bot. a large intercellular space in the stems and leaves of aquatic plants, and in the stems of endogens.

Air-pipe (ār'pīp), n. A pipe used to draw foul air out of, or conduct fresh air into close places. Specifically, (a) a pipe used to draw foul air from a ship's hold by means of a communication with the furnace, and the rarefaction of the air by the fire. This pipe is intended to supply the combustion with the air of the hold, by preventing the access of other air to the fire. (b) In mining, a pipe or tube made of wood or iron, for conducting or conveying fresh air into levels having but one communication with the atmosphere.

Air-plant (ār'plant), n. 1. A general name for the orchids belonging to the genus Aerides (which see).—2. A general term applied to epiphytes which derive all their food from the atmosphere. See EPIPHYTE.

Air-poise (ār'poiz), n. An instrument to measure the weight of the air.

Air-port (ār'pōrt), n. A name given to large scuttles in ships' bows for the admission of air when the other ports are down. The Americans call their side-ports also by this name.

Air-pump (ār'pump), n. A most valuable pneumatic machine, for the purpose of exhausting the air from a closed vessel called a receiver, and thereby producing what is called a vacuum, which, however, is only partial. It was invented by Otto Guericke in 1654, but has since been much improved. The air-pump acts by the elastic force of air, and gradually exhausts the air from the receiver by means of a piston, with a proper valve, working in a cylindrical barrel or tube, somewhat after the manner of a common water-pump; each successive stroke rarefies the air more and more, a barometer gauge showing the extent of the rarefaction. The exhaustion is limited by the elasticity of the remaining air being no longer capable of opening the valves. Air-pumps are variously constructed; the most common forms have two barrels and two pistons wrought by a toothed wheel, as that represented in the annexed cut. See VACUUM.—The air-pump of a steam-engine is the pump by which the condensing water and condensed steam are drawn off from the condenser. It is an appendage of every condensing engine, but is not, of course, requisite in high-pressure or non-condensing engines. See cut STEAM-ENGINE.—Air-pump bucket, an open piston with valves on the upper surface opening upwards so as to admit the air and water in the down-stroke, and lift it with the up-stroke of the pump.

Air-sac (ār'sak), n. In physiol. one of the membranous bags or receptacles of air lodged in the hollow bones, the cavities of the body, and the quills of birds, and communicating with the lungs. They enlarge the respiratory surface, accelerate circulation, and thus increase muscular energy. They are also supposed to render the body specifically lighter, and to supply the place of a muscular diaphragm.

Air-scuttle (ār'skut-l), n. Same as Air-port.

Air-shaft (ār'shaft), n. A passage for air into a mine, usually opening in a perpendicular direction, and meeting the adits or horizontal passages, and so causing a free circulation of fresh air through the mine.

Air-slacked (ār'slakt), a. Slacked or pulverized by the action of air, or of the moisture in the atmosphere; as, air-slacked lime.

Air-stove (ār'stōv), n. A stove which is employed to heat a current of air directed against its surface by means of pipes, which heated air is then admitted to the apartment requiring to be heated.

Airt, Airth (ârt, ârth), n. [Gael. aird, point of the compass.] Point of the compass; quarter of the heavens; direction. [Originally Scotch, now also used by English writers.]

> Of a' the airts the wind can blaw
> I dearly like the west. Burns.

> On such days, unless the wind is in exactly the right airt for the ground, it is far wiser to stay at home. Ency. of Sport.

Airt (ârt), v.t. To direct. [Scotch.]

Air-thermometer (âr'thêr-mom"et-êr), n. A thermometer in which air (or a gas) is employed as a substitute for mercury or spirit of wine. Of these there are several kinds. They are accurate and well fitted for measuring high degrees of heat, but are difficult to manage.

Air-thread (âr'thred), n. A name given to the filaments attached by spiders to the tops or ends of branches of shrubs or trees, and serving to support the spider when in quest of prey.

Air-tight (âr'tīt), a. So tight or close as to be impermeable to air. A vessel or tube is said to be air-tight when it possesses that degree of closeness which prevents the passage of air under the circumstances in which it is placed.

Air-trap (âr'trap), n. A contrivance for excluding the effluvia arising from drains and sinks. Also, a recess at a knee of a water-main, for receiving and retaining air that may be liberated from the water. It is provided with a valve for taking off the air from time to time, as it accumulates.

Air-trunk (âr'trungk), n. A contrivance to prevent the stagnation of putrid effluvia in jails or apartments where many people are collected. It is merely a square open tube, passing from the ceiling to the open air above the roof, by which the heated air escapes.

Air-tube (âr'tūb), n. 1. In zool. a name given to certain horny passages for air in the abdomen of some aquatic insects.—2. Naut. a small iron tube hung in a coal box from the deck, and filled with water, for the purpose of ascertaining the temperature of the coals by a thermometer as a precaution against spontaneous combustion. E. H. Knight.—3. The tube of an atmospheric railway (which see under ATMOSPHERIC).

Air-valve (âr'valv), n. A valve applied to steam-boilers to prevent a vacuum when the steam is condensing in the boiler; the safety-valve fixed at the top of the boiler of the steam-engine.

Air-vessel (âr'ves-sel), n. In hydraulics, a vessel in which air is condensed by pressure, for the purpose of employing the reaction of its elasticity as a moving or as a regulating power. Such vessels are employed in fire-engines and force-pumps.

Air-way (âr'wā), n. A passage for air; specifically, a passage for the admission of air to a mine. To maliciously fill up, obstruct, or damage an air-way is, by 24 and 25 Vict. xcvii., a felony punishable by penal servitude or imprisonment at the discretion of the judge.

Airy (â'ri), a. 1. Consisting or having the character of air; ethereal. 'The thinner and more airy parts of bodies.' Bacon.—2. Relating or belonging to the air; high in air. 'Airy navies grappling in the central blue.' Tennyson.—3. Open to a free current of air; as, an airy situation.—4. Light as air; resembling air in being impalpable or invisible; unsubstantial; hence, fig. without reality or sincerity; trifling; empty; as, airy ghosts; airy notions.

> The poet's pen . . . gives to airy nothing
> A local habitation and a name. Shak.

> I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality that it is but a shadow's shadow. Shak.

5. Gay; sprightly; full of vivacity and levity; light of heart; lively.

> His light airy brilliancy has suddenly become solemn, fixed in the earnest stillness of eternity. Carlyle.

6. In landscape-painting, showing that proper recession of all parts which expresses distance and atmosphere.

Airy (â'ri), n. Same as Aerie.

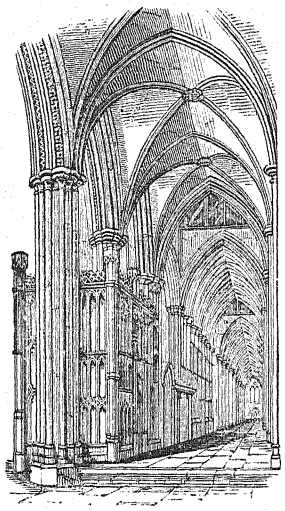
Aisle (īl), n. [O.Fr. aisle, Fr. aile, a wing, an aisle; L. ala, a wing; the s does not properly belong to the word.] The wing of a building: usually applied to the lateral divisions of a cathedral or other church, which are separated from the central part, called the nave and choir, by pillars or piers. The nave is frequently, though incorrectly, termed the middle aisle, and the lateral divisions side aisles. Sometimes incorrectly written Isle. See figure showing ground plan of a cathedral under CATHEDRAL.



Aisle, Salisbury Cathedral.

Aisled (īld), a. Furnished with aisles. A church which in its breadth is divided into three or five parts is sometimes called a three or five aisled church.

Ait (āt), n. [Another form of eyot, an islet.] A small island in a river or lake. 'Fog up the river, where it flows among green aits and meadows.' Dickens.

Aitchbone (āch'bōn), n. Edgebone (which see).

Aitch-piece, H-piece (āch'pēs), n. That part of a plunger-lift in which the clack or valve of a pump of any description is fixed. See PUMP.

Aith (āth), n. Oath. [Scotch.]

Aitiology (ī-ti-ol'o-ji), n. [Gr. aitia, a cause, and logos, a discourse.] The doctrine of efficient, as opposed to final, causes.

Aits (āts), n. Oats. [Scotch.]

Aiver, Aver (ā'vêr), n. [Norm. and O.E., from L.L. averia, horses, cattle, pl. of averium, wealth, from Fr. avoir, L. habere, to have.] A work-horse. [Scotch.]

Aix-beds (āks'bedz), n. pl. In geol. thick fresh-water tertiary strata, occurring near Aix, in Provence, in France, consisting of calcareous marls, calcareo-siliceous grits and gypsum, and full of fossil fishes, insects, and plants.

Aizle (ȳz'l), n. [A. Sax. ysela, ysla, a spark, an ember.] A hot cinder; an ember. [Scotch.]

Aizoon (ā-zō'on), n. [L. aizoon, from Gr. aeizōon, ever-living—aei, ever, aye, and zōon, living.] A genus of prostrate herbaceous plants, nat. order Ficoideæ, and containing about twenty species natives of subtropical regions. They are very tenacious of life. A. canariense and A. hispanicum abound in soda.

Ajar (a-jär'), adv. [In O.E. also achar and onchar, lit. on the turn, from prefix a, on, at, and jar or char, A. Sax. cerre, a turn, seen also in char or chare, *char*woman.] On the turn; neither quite open nor shut; partly opened: said of a door.

Ajee (a-jē'), adv. [Prefix a, on, at, and jee or gee, to move, to move to one side.] Awry; off the right line; obliquely; wrong. [Scotch.]

> His brain was a wee ajee, but he was a braw preacher for a' that. Sir W. Scott.

Ajuga (a-jū'ga), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Labiatæ, containing about fifty species of annual or perennial herbs occurring in the temperate regions of the Old World. Four of the species are British, inhabiting pastures chiefly. A. reptans is the common bugle.

Ajuru (a-ū'rų), n. The Brazilian generic name for parrot.

Ajust,† v.t. To adjust; to apply. Chaucer.

Ajutage (a'jūt-āj), n. [Fr. ajoutage, something added, from ajouter, to join, and this from L.L. adjuxtare, to apply, fit, or fix to—L. ad, to, and juxta, nigh.] A sort of tube fitted to the aperture of a vessel through which water is played.

Akbeer (ak'bēr), n. A red powder thrown on the clothes and person at Hindu festivals.

Ake† (āk), n. and v. Same as Ache.

> His limbs must ake with daily toil opprest. Prior.

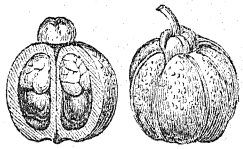
Akee (a-kē'), n. The fruit of Blighia sapida, nat. order Sapindaceæ, a native of Guinea, whence it was carried by Captain Bligh to Jamaica in 1793, and thence disseminated over the West Indies and South America. The plant is a tree 30 or 40 feet high; the leaves somewhat resemble those of the ash;



Akee Fruit.

the flowers are small and white; the fruit is oblong, ribbed, of a reddish-orange colour, and contains several large jet-black seeds partly imbedded in a pale straw-coloured, succulent, and slightly bitter aril, which is cooked and eaten (the stringy parts being removed), and is very grateful to the palate.

Akehorn,† n. Acorn. Chaucer.

Akele,† v.t. [Prefix a, and kele, A. Sax. cēlan, to cool.] To cool. Chaucer.

Aker-staff (ā'kêr-staf), n. [Aker = acre, field.] In agri. an instrument for clearing the coulter of the plough.

Aketon (ak'ton), n. The acton (which see).

Akimbo (a-kim'bō), a. [Prefix a, on, and kimbo (which see).] Arched; crooked. The arms are akimbo when the hands are on the hips and the elbows arched outwards. 'With one arm akimbo.' Irving.

Akin (a-kin'), a. or adv. [Prefix a, of, and kin. See KIN.] 1. Related by blood: used of persons; as, the two families are near akin.—2. Allied by nature; partaking of the same properties; as, envy and jealousy are near akin. 'Pity's akin to love.' Southern.

Aknee (a-nē'), adv. On the knee. [Rare.]

> Aknee they fell before the prince. Southey.

Akrokeraunian (ak'ro-ke-rą"ni-an), a. Same as Acroceraunian. 'The vast Akrokeraunian walls.' Tennyson.

Al,† a. adv. n. All.

Ala (ā'la), n. pl. Alæ (ā'lē). [L., a wing.] 1. In bot. one of the two side petals of a papilionaceous blossom, or the membranous expansion of an organ, as of a fruit, seed, stem, &c. See WING.—2. In anat. a term applied to many parts; as, ala auris, the upper and outer part of the external ear; alæ nasi, the lateral cartilages of the nose, &c.

Alabandine (al-a-ban'din), n. Manganese glance or blende. It is a sulphide of manganese.

Alabarches (al-a-bär'kēz), n. In ancient times, the chief magistrate of the Jews in Alexandria, whose duty lay chiefly in raising and paying taxes. Written also Arabarches.

Alabaster (al'a-bas-têr), n. [L. alabaster, from Gr. alabastros, from Alabastron, a village in Egypt where there were quarries of this mineral.] 1. A marble-like mineral of which there are two well-known varieties—the gypseous and the calcareous. The former is a crystalline granular variety of sulphate of calcium or gypsum ($CaSO_4 2H_2O$). It is of various colours, as yellow, red, and gray, but is most esteemed when pure white. Being soft it can be formed by the lathe or knife into small works of art, as vases, statuettes, &c. For this purpose the snow-white, fine-grained variety found near Florence is especially used. Calcareous alabaster is a variety of carbonate of lime occurring as a stalactite or stalagmite in caverns of limestone rocks.—2. A vessel for holding odoriferous liquors or ointments, originally so called because made of alabaster, but the name was applied also to similar vessels of other materials, as gold.

Alabaster (al'a-bas-têr), a. Made of alabaster, or resembling it. 'An alabaster column.' Addison.

Alabastrian (al-a-bas'tri-an), a. Pertaining to or like alabaster.

Alabastrine (al-a-bas'trīn), a. Of, or pertaining to, or resembling alabaster.—Ala- bastrine positive, in photog. the name given to a collodion positive in which the film, after being coloured with dry pigments, is rendered permeable to varnish, and thus shows the colour in the collodion itself.

Alabastrite (al-a-bas'trīt), n. [L. alabastrites, alabaster. See ALABASTER.] 1. A name sometimes given to alabaster. Hence— 2. A vase, box, or other vessel formed of alabaster.

Alabastron (al-a-bas'tron), n. Same as Alabaster.

Alabastrus (al-a-bas'trus), n. [L.L., from alabaster.] A name given to a flower-bud. It was originally applied to the rose-bud. Written also Alabastrum.

Alack (a-lak'), interj. [Probably a form of alas.] An exclamation expressive of sorrow.

Alack! when once our grace we have forgot,
Nothing goes right. Shak.

Alackaday (a-lak'a-dā), interj. [Alas-the-day! Comp. Well-a-day!] An exclamation uttered to express regret or sorrow. Written also Alack-the-day. [Obsolescent.]

Alb, Albe (alb), n. [L. alba, white (vestis, garment, understood).] A clerical vestment worn by Roman Catholic priests while officiating in the more solemn functions of the divine office. It is a long robe of white linen reaching to the feet, bound round the waist by a cincture, and fitting more closely to the body than the surplice. In front at the foot, embroidery or orphreywork, of a form usually square or oblong, is attached, and at the wrists several enrichments appear. These ornaments are called the apparels of the alb. It was originally the common dress of ecclesiastics.

Each priest adorn'd was in a surplice white,
The bishops donn'd their albs and copes of state.
Fairfax.

Albacore (al'ba-kōr), n. [Sp. albacora, Pg. albacor, albacora, Fr. albicore, from Ar. bakr, a young camel, a young cow or heifer, and the article al.] A name given to several fishes of the tunny or mackerel kind, especially to the Pacific tunny (Thynnus Pacificus). Written also Albicore.

Albata (al-bā'ta), n. [L. albus, white.] An alloy consisting of a combination of nickel, zinc, tin, and copper, often with antimony and silver, united in various proportions. It is a white metal, resembling silver in appearance, and is made into spoons, forks, teapots, &c. Called also British Plate and German-silver.

He was not the genuine article, but a substitute, a kind of albata. G. A. Sala.

Albatros, Albatross (al'ba-tros), n. [Fr. albatros, in Flacourt and Dampier algatros, a corruption of Sp. Pg. alcatraz, originally a pelican, but also applied to other aquatic birds. Marcel Devic (in supplement to Littré's Dictionary) takes alcatraz to be equivalent to Pg. alcatruz (Ar. al-qādūs), the bucket of a noria or water-wheel, this term being applied to the pelican for the same reason that the Arabs call it saqqā or water-carrier, from being supposed to carry water to its young ones in the pouch below its bill.] An aquatic natatorial bird, family Procellariadæ, of which the wandering albatros (Diomedea exulans) is the best known species. The bill is straight; the upper mandible crooked at the point, and the lower one truncated; the nostrils are oval, open and little prominent, and placed on the sides; the wings are pennated, and there are three webbed toes on each foot. The upper part of the body is of a spotted brown, and the belly white. It is the largest sea-bird known, some measuring 17½ feet from tip to tip of their expanded wings. They abound at the Cape of Good Hope and in Behring's Straits, and have been known to accompany ships for whole days without ever resting on the waves. From this habit it is regarded with feelings of attachment and superstitious awe by sailors, it being reckoned unlucky to kill one. Coleridge has availed himself of this feeling in his 'Ancient Mariner.'

Albe,† Albee,† adv. Albeit. Spenser.

Albeit (al-bē'it), conj. [A compound of the old al in the sense of though, be, and it, and equivalent to be it so; comp. Chaucer's 'al speke he,' 'al have I;' he also uses the fuller form 'al be it so that.'] Be it so; admit all that; although; notwithstanding.

Whereas ye say, The Lord saith it, albeit I have not spoken. Ezek. xiii. 11.

A book, originally blank, in which may be inserted autographs of celebrated persons or favourite pieces of poetry or prose, generally contributed by friends.—3. A blank book with ornamental binding for preserving photographic views, cartes de visite, &c.—4. In law, white or silver money paid as rent.

Albumen (al-bū'men), n. [L., from albus, white.] In physiol. a substance so named from the Latin for the white of an egg, in which it abounds in its purest natural state, serving as the type of the protein compounds or the nitrogenous class of food stuffs. It is a proximate principle, entering largely into the composition of the animal and vegetable fluids and solids, is coagulable by heat at and above 160°, and is composed of carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen, with a little sulphur. It abounds in the serum of the blood, the vitreous and crystalline humours of the eye, the fluid of dropsy, the substance called coagulable lymph, in nutritive matters, the juice of flesh, &c. The blood contains about 7 per cent. of albumen. It is the starting-point of all the tissues. Vegetable albumen exists in most vegetable juices and many seeds, and has the same composition and properties as animal. Albumen is used to clarify syrupy liquors, and to fix colours in printing. In cookery white of eggs is employed for clarifying, but in large operations like sugar-refining the serum of blood is used. With lime it forms a cement to mend broken ware. In bot. the name is applied to the farinaceous matter which surrounds the embryo. It constitutes the meat of the cocoa-nut, the flour or meal of cereals, the roasted part of coffee, &c. Albumen exists either as soluble or as insoluble albumen. The former variety is converted into the latter by the action of heat.

Albumen—Section of a grain of Wheat.

Albumenize (al-bū'men-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. albumenized; ppr. albumenizing. To convert into albumen; to cover or impregnate with albumen, as paper with the white of an egg for photographic purposes.

Album Græcum (al'bum grē'kum), n. The dung of dogs, wolves, hyænas, &c., which, from exposure to the air, becomes white like chalk. It was formerly used as a medicine, and is still used by tanners to soften leather.

Albuminin (al-bū'min-in), n. Oonin; the substance of the cells inclosing the white of birds' eggs. It contains no nitrogen, and dissolves in caustic potash.

Albuminoid (al-bū'min-oid), a. [L. albumen, and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] Like albumen.

Albuminoid (al-bū'min-oid), n. A substance resembling albumen. Same as Proteid (which see).

Albuminose, Albuminous (al-bū'min-ōs, al-bū'min-us), a. 1. Pertaining to or having the properties of albumen.—2. In bot. applied to plants whose seeds have a store of albumen, as all kinds of grain, palms, &c.

Albuminousness (al-bū'min-us-nes), n. The state of being albuminous.

Albuminuria (al-bū'mi-nū"ri-a), n. [L. albumen, and Gr. ouron, urine.] In med. a granular disease of the cortical part of the kidney, which gives occasion to the secretion of urine that contains albumen.

Alburn (al'bėrn), n. Same as Alburnum.

Alburn (al'bėrn), n. [L. alburnus, from albus, white.] A name sometimes given to the fish more commonly called the Bleak.

Alchemize (al′kem-īz), v.t. To change by alchemy; to transmute, as metals. Lovelace. [Rare.]

Alchemy, Alchymy (al′ke-mi, al′ki-mi), n. [Ar. al, the, and kīmīā, chemistry. See CHEMISTRY.] 1.† Chemistry. ('Alchemy was never at any time anything different from chemistry.' Liebig.) Hence, from the fact that the early chemists were often deficient in their theoretical views, and pursued in their experiments delusive ends, such as the discovery of the philosopher's stone, which, being mixed with the baser metals, was to transmute them into gold, to be a panacea or universal remedy for diseases, and an alkahest or universal solvent, it came to mean, specifically—2. The doctrines and practice of those who dabbled in such arts.—3. Formerly, a mixed metal used for utensils. It was a modification of brass; so called because believed to have been originally formed by the art of alchemy: used figuratively by Milton for a trumpet.

Your speedy cherubims
Put to their mouths the sounding alchymy.
Milton.

Alcohol (al′kō-hol), n. [Sp. Pg. alcohol—Ar. al, the, and kohl, a fine powder of antimony applied by orientals to the eyes. On account of the fineness of this powder the name is said to have been transferred to anything very fine or purified, as rectified spirits.] (C_2H_6O.) A liquid forming the intoxicating principle of all vinous and spirituous liquors. It is formed by the fermentation of aqueous sugar solutions, and by the destructive distillation of organic bodies, as coal. It has also been produced by causing water (H_2O) to combine chemically with olefiant gas (C_2H_4), the method adopted being to shake the gas with strong sulphuric acid, and afterwards to dilute the mixture with water and distil. Having been first procured from wine, the name of spirit of wine is given to the strongest alcoholic found in commerce, containing about 90° per cent. of pure alcohol. Absolute or pure alcohol is a transparent fluid, of a pleasant spirituous smell and burning taste; sp. gr. 0·793 at 60° F. It has never been frozen, but it becomes viscid at very low temperatures. It is very inflammable, and mixes with water in all proportions, is a solvent of all bodies which are rich in hydrogen, as organic bases, resins, and oils, and as such much used in chemical operations, and for the preparation of druggists' tinctures; and is a powerful stimulant and an antiseptic. It is employed in filling thermometers for low temperatures. By volume 55 parts of alcohol and 45 of water, or 49·2 parts by weight of alcohol and 50·8 of water, form proof spirit. Under-proof and over-proof are the designations of weaker or stronger solutions. Alcohol, mixed with various proportions of water, essential oils, sugar, and extracts, forms the different kinds of alcoholic drinks known as ardent spirits, wine, beer, &c. Spirits, as whisky, brandy, &c., contain 40 to 50 per cent. of absolute alcohol; wines, from 17 to 7 or 8; strong ale and porter, 6 to 8; and small beer, 1 per cent. Alcohol is also the general name given to a series of chemical compounds, all of which are constituted similarly.

Alcoholate (al′kō-hol-āt), n. A salt in which alcohol appears to replace the water of crystallization.

Alcoholic (al-kō-hol′ik), a. Pertaining to alcohol, or partaking of its qualities.

Alcoholic (al-kō-hol′ik), n. An alcoholic liquid.

Alcoholism (al′kō-hol-izm), n. The condition of habitual drunkards, whose tissues are saturated with spirits. Called also Chronic Alcoholism.

Alcoholization (al-kō-hol′iz-ā″shon), n. 1. The act of rectifying spirit till it is wholly deprived of impurities.—2.† The act of reducing a substance to an impalpable powder. Johnson.

Alcoholize (al′kō-hol-īz), v.t. 1. To convert into alcohol; to rectify spirit till it is wholly purified.—2.† To reduce to an impalpable powder. Johnson.

Alcoholmeter (al-kō-hol′mē-tėr), n. Same as Alcoholometer.

Alcoholometer, Alcohometer (al′kō-hol-om′et-ėr, al′kō-hom″et-ėr), n. [Alcohol, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for determining the quantity of pure alcohol in any liquid, with a scale graduated so as to indicate the percentage, either by weight or volume.

Alcoholometrical, Alcohometrical (al′kō-ho-lo-met″rik-al, al′kō-ho-met″rik-al), a. Relating to the alcoholometer; as, alcoholometrical tables.

Alcoholometry, Alcoometry (al′kō-hol-om″et-ri, al′kō-om″et-ri), n. The process of estimating the percentage of pure or absolute alcohol in a spirituous liquid.

Alcoometer (al-kō-om′et-ėr), n. [Fr. alcoometre.] Same as Alcoholometer (which see).

Alcoran (al′kō-ran or al′kō-rąn). See KORAN and ALKORAN.

Alcoranic (al-kō-ran′ik or al-kō-rąn′ik), a. Relating to the Alcoran or Mohammedanism.

Alcoranish (al-kō-ran′ish or al-kō-rąn′ish), a. Belonging to the Koran or Alcoran, or to Mohammedanism. 'Some Alcoranish doctors.' Sir T. Herbert.

Alcoranist (al-kō-ran′ist or al-kō-rąn′ist), n. A strict adherent to the letter of the Koran or Alcoran.

Alcove (al′kōv), n. [Fr. alcove, Sp. alcoba—Ar. al, the, and kubbeh, an alcove, a little chamber.] A recess; especially, (a) a wide and deep recess in a room, usually separated from it by a screen of columns, by a balustrade, or by draperies, and intended for the reception of a bed of state or seats, and often having its floor raised above that of the room. More rarely, (b) a lateral recess in a library for the reception of books. (c) An arched or covered seat in a garden. (d) Any natural recess, as a recess in a grove or wood, a small bay, a place nearly inclosed by rocks, hills, and the like. [Chiefly poetical.]

On mossy banks, beneath the citron grove,
The youthful wand'rers found a wild alcove.
Falconer.

Alcyon (al′si-on), n. An old or poetical name of the kingfisher. Same as Halcyon (which see).

Alcyonaria (al′si-o-nā″ri-a), n. pl. [See ALCYONIUM.] An order of actinozoan corals, distinguished by six or eight broad leaf-like tentacles, arranged round the mouth like the rays of a star-fish (whence their alternative name Asteroidā). They inhabit a polypidom, and consist of a fleshy external layer, supported on a calcareous axis secreted from the outer surface of the animal, and embrace the organ-pipe corals, the Alcyonidæ or dead-men's fingers, the Gorgonidæ or sea-fans, and the sea-pens. Some species very much resemble sponges; others are like fans, feathers, &c. Technically they are called Sclerobasic Zoantharia.

Alcyonaria.

1, Sea-fan (Gorgonia flabellum). 2, Sea-pen (Pennatula phosphorea). 3, Cornularia rugosa.

Alcyonic (al-si-on′ik), a. Pertaining to the Alcyonidæ (which see).

Alcyonidæ, Alcyoneæ (al-si-on′i-dē, al-si-on′ē-ē), n. pl. [See ALCYONIUM.] A family of asteroid polypes, somewhat resembling the sponges. Alcyonium digitatum, called variously, from its occasional form, dead-man's hand or cow's paps, is the type. They are found in all seas and at various depths.

Alcyonite (al′si-on-īt), n. A fossil alcyonium; one of the spongiferous fossils common in the chalk formation.

Alcyonium (al-si-ō′ni-um), n. [L. alcyonium, Gr. alkyonion, alkyoneion, a zoophyte so called from its resemblance to the Halcyon's nest. See HALCYON.] A genus of asteroid polypes or Actinozoa, belonging to the family Alcyonidæ (which see).

Alcyonoid (al′si-on-oid), n. A member of the family Alcyonidæ or Alcyoneæ. Written also Halcyonoid.

Aldebaran (al-deb′a-rän), n. [Ar. name, from al, the, debarān, coming behind: so called, it is said, because it comes behind the remarkable group of the Pleiades.] A star of the first magnitude in the constellation Taurus. Vulgarly called the Bull's Eye. It is the bright star in the group of five called the Hyads.

Aldehyde, Aldehyd (al'dē-hīd), n. [Al, first syllable of alcohol, and dehyd, the first two of dehydrogenatus, deprived of hydrogen.] 1. A transparent colourless liquid (C_2H_4O) produced by the oxidation of pure alcohol. It is alcohol minus two atoms of hydrogen. It has a suffocating odour, and is so volatile that it boils by the warmth of the hand. When exposed to air or oxygen it becomes entirely converted into acetic acid or vinegar, by the addition of one atom of oxygen. Called also Acetic Aldehyde. — 2. One of a class of organic compounds, intermediate between alcohols and acids, derived from alcohol by the abstraction of two atoms of hydrogen, and converted into acids by the addition of one atom of oxygen. They are all liquids except one, which is a fatty solid. They are called benzoic, acetic, butyric, &c., aldehydes.

Aldehydic (al-dē-hīd'ik), a. Of or pertaining to or containing aldehyde.

Alder (ạl'dėr), n. [O. and Prov. E. aller, eller, &c.; A. Sax. ælr, aler, alor, alr; Icel. elrir, elri, ölr; N. older, elle; Sw. al; Sw. dial. alder; G. eller, erle; all allied to L. alnus, an alder, and to D. and G. else, Slav. olsza, olsche, an alder. The d is inserted in the same way as in alder for aller, old genit. pl. of all. See next art. and ELDER, the tree.] The popular name of plants of the genus Alnus, nat. order Betulaceæ. A. glutinosa is the common alder, usually growing in moist land. The wood of the alder has the quality of long endurance under water. It is chiefly used for hurdle-wood and the manufacture of charcoal. See ALNUS. — Berry-bearing or black alder, the alder-buckthorn, or Rhamnus Frangula. Red alder, the name given at the Cape of Good Hope to Cunonia capensis. White alder, the North American name for Clithra alnifolia.

Alder,† Aller† (ạl'dėr, ạl'ėr), a. The ancient genitive plural of all; in A. Sax. eal, genit. pl. ealra, alra. It was also written Alther. It was formerly prefixed to adjectives in the superlative; as, alder-first, first of all; alder-best, best of all; alder-liefest or alder-lievest, dearest of all. It is largely used by Chaucer. 'You, mine alder-liefest sovereign.' Shak.

A-morwe when the day began to spring,
Up rose our hoste, and was our aller cok. Chaucer.

Alder-buckthorn (ạl'dėr-buk-thorn), n. A British plant of the genus Rhamnus, nat. order Rhamnaceæ, the R. Frangula. It is a shrub 3 to 10 feet high, and grows in woods and thickets. See RHAMNUS.

Alderman (ạl'dėr-man), n. pl. Aldermen (ạl'dėr-men). [A. Sax. aldorman, ealdorman —ealdor, an elder, from eald, old, and man.] 1. Among our Anglo-Saxon ancestors, a person of rank or dignity, a prince, a nobleman. It was originally used as a name of dignity unconnected with office, but in later times the title had a more specific sense, and was applied to the members of the Anglo-Saxon nobility next in rank to the king, and at the head of the government of the shires or other districts as well as of cities and boroughs.—2. In present usage, a magistrate or officer of a town corporate, next in rank below the mayor, possessing a certain judicial authority as well as municipal administrative powers. The number of aldermen is different in different cities, but by 5 and 6 Will. IV. lxxvi. they must be one-third of the councillors. The corresponding title in Scotland is bailie.—3. Half-a-crown: a meaning explained by Brewer as containing an allusion to the fact that an alderman is a sort of half-king. [Slang.]—4. A turkey. [Slang.]—An alderman in chains, a turkey hung with sausages. [Slang.]—Alderman's pace, a slow stately pace, equivalent to the French pas d'abbé.

Aldermancy (ạl'dėr-man-si), n. The office of an alderman.

Aldermanic (ạl'dėr-man'ik), a. Relating to or becoming an alderman.

Aldermanity (ạl'dėr-man'i-ti), n. 1. Aldermen collectively; the body of aldermen. B. Jonson.—2. The dignity or qualities of an alderman.

Aldermanlike (ạl'dėr-man-līk), a. Like an alderman.

Aldermanly (ạl'dėr-man-li), a. Pertaining to or like an alderman.

Aldermanry (ạl'dėr-man-ri), n. The office or quality of an alderman.

Aldermanship (ạl'dėr-man-ship), n. The condition of an alderman. Fabyan.

Aldern (al'dėrn), a. Made of alder.

Then aldern boats first plowed the ocean. May.

Aldine (al'dīn), a. A term applied to those editions, chiefly of the classics, which proceeded from the press of Aldus Manutius, of Venice, and his family, from 1490 to 1597. The distinguishing mark is an anchor entwined with a dolphin, generally with the motto sudavit et alsit (he has sweated and frozen, that is, he has endured all extremes of hardship). The term has been also applied to certain editions of English works.

Aldrian,† n. A star in the neck of the Lion. Chaucer.

Ale (āl), n. [A. Sax. eale, ealu, eala; Dan. Sw. and Icel. öl, ale. In the O. Icel. öl is used of any intoxicating drink, and Wedgwood derives it from a root meaning to drink, seen in G.ael. ól, to drink.] 1. A liquor made from an infusion of malt by fermentation. It is of different sorts, chiefly pale and brown, the first made from malt slightly dried, the second from malt more considerably dried or roasted. It is usually made with barley, but sometimes with wheat, rye, millets, oats, &c. Pale ale is made with the palest hops, and the fermenting temperature is kept below 72° to prevent the formation of acetic acid.—2. A merry meeting in English country places, so called from the liquor drunk. 'At wakes and ales.' B. Jonson. 3.† An ale-house.

O, Tom, that we were now at Putney, at the ale there. Thom. Lord Cromwell.

—Medicated ales are those which are prepared for medicinal purposes by an infusion of herbs during fermentation.

Aleak (a-lēk'), adv. In a leaking state.

Aleatory (al'ē-a-to-ri), a. [L. alea, a die, chance.] Depending on a contingent event. —Aleatory contract, in law, an agreement of which the conditions depend on an uncertain event.—Aleatory sale, a sale the completion of which depends on the happening of some uncertain event.

Aleavement† (a-lēv'ment), n. Alleviation.

Yet this is some aleavement to my sorrow.
Solimon and Perseda, 1599.

Ale-bench (āl'bensh), n. A bench in or before an ale-house. 'Sit on their ale-bench with their cups and cans.' Sir John Oldcastle.

Ale-berry (āl'be-ri), n. A beverage formerly made by boiling ale with spice, sugar, and sops of bread.

Ale-brewer (āl'brö-ėr), n. One whose occupation is to brew ale.

Alecampane (al-e-kam-pān'), n. A kind of coarse sweetmeat. See ELECAMPANE, 2.

Ale-conner (āl'kon-ėr), n. [Ale, and con, to know or see.] Originally, an officer appointed to assay ale and beer, and to take care that they were good and wholesome, and sold at a proper price. The duty of the ale-conners of London now is to inspect the measures used in public-houses, to prevent frauds in selling liquors. Four of these are chosen annually by the liverymen, in common hall, on midsummer's day.

Ale-cost (āl'kost), n. Costmary, a plant (Balsamita vulgaris) put into ale to give it an aromatic flavour. See COSTMARY.

Alector (a-lek'tėr), n. [Gr. alektōr, a cock.] A genus of gallinaceous birds, commonly called curassows, family Cracidæ. They are peculiar to the New World, and somewhat resemble turkeys. See CURASSOW.

Alectoria (a-lek-tō'ri-a), n. [Gr. alektōr, a cock.] 1. Cock-stone; a peculiar stone, supposed to be sometimes found in the stomach or liver of an aged cock or capon. Many virtues were attributed to it, but these, as well as the origin of the stone, are imaginary. 2. A genus of lichens. A. jubata, or rock hair, grows on trees and rocks, and affords food for the reindeer during deep snow.

Alectoromachy,† Alectryomachy† (a-lek'-tōr-om''a-ki, a-lek'tri-om''a-ki), n. [Gr. alektōr, a cock, and machē, a fight.] Cock-fighting.

Alectryomancy, Alectoromancy (a-lek'-tri-ō-man-si, a-lek'tō-rō-man-si), n. [Gr. alektryōn, a cock, and manteia, divination.] An ancient practice of foretelling events by means of a cock. The letters of the alphabet were traced on the ground, and a grain of corn placed on each; a cock was then permitted to pick up the grains, and the letters under the grains selected, being formed into words, were supposed to foretell the event.

Ale-draper† (āl'drā-pėr), n. A humorous name for a keeper of an ale-house; one who sells ale: probably from the ancient custom of measuring ale by the yard. See ALE-YARD.

I get mee a wife; with her a little money; when we are married, seeke a house we must; no other occupation have I but to be an ale-draper. Henry Cheitle.

Alee (a-lē'), adv. [Prefix a, on or at, and lee. See LEE.] Naut. on the side opposite to that on which the wind strikes: opposite of a-weather. The helm of a ship is alee when pressed close to the lee-side.—Hard alee, or luff alee, an order to put the helm to the lee-side.—Helm's alee, that is, the helm is alee, a notice given as an order to the seamen to cause the head-sails to shake in the wind with a view to bring the ship about.

Alegar (āl'ē-gėr), n. [Ale, and eager, Fr. aigre, sour.] Sour ale; vinegar made of ale. [Rare.]

For not, after consideration, can you ascertain what liquor it is you are imbibing; whether . . . Hawkin's entire, or, perhaps, some other great brewer's penny-swipes, or even alegar. Carlyle.

Alege,† Alegge,† v.t. [See ALLAY.] To allay; to alleviate; to soothe; to assuage.

The joyous time now nigheth fast
That shall alegge this bitter blast. Spenser.

Alegeaunce,† n. [See ALEGE.] Alleviation. Chaucer.

Aleger† (al'ē-jėr), a. [Fr. allègre, L. alacris, sprightly.] Gay; cheerful; sprightly.

Coffee, the root and leaf betle, and tobacco . . . do all condense the spirits and make them strong and aleger. Bacon.

Ale-gill (āl'jil), n. [See GILL.] A kind of medicated liquor from the infusion of ground-ivy in malt liquor.

Ale-glass (āl'glas), n. A glass from which ale is drunk.

Ale-hoof (āl'höf), n. [D. eiloof, ivy.] Ground-ivy (Nepeta Glechoma). The word assumed this form because its leaves were used in making ale before the use of hops.

Ale-house (āl'hous), n. A house where ale is retailed.

The redcoats filled all the ale-houses of Westminster and the Strand. Macaulay.

Aleis,† n. [Fr. alize.] The lote-tree. Chaucer.

Ale-knight† (āl'nīt), n. A pot-companion.

Come, all you brave wights, that are dubbed ale-knights
Know malt is of mickle might. Wit's Recreations.

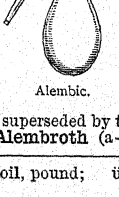
Alemannic (al-ē-man'ik), a. [L. Alemanni, from two German words signifying all men. Comp. Fr. Allemagne, Germany.] Belonging to the Alemanni, a military confederacy of several German tribes who began to appear on the Lower and Middle Maine about the beginning of the third century.

Alemannic (al-ē-man'ik), n. The language of the Alemanni, or ancient people of Germany.

Alembdar (a-lem'dār), n. In Turkey, an officer who bears the green standard of Mohammed when the sultan appears in public.

Alembic (a-lem'bik), n. [L.L. alembicum; Sp. alambigue—Ar. al, the, ambik, an alembic, from Gr. ambix, ambikos, a cup, a beaker, the cap of a still.] A chemical vessel formerly used in distillation, usually made of glass or copper. The bottom part, containing the liquor to be distilled, was called the matrass or cucurbit; the upper part, which received and condensed the volatile products, was called the head or capital, the beak of which was fitted to the neck of a receiver. The head was more properly the alembic. It is now superseded by the retort and worm-still.



Alembic.

Alembroth (a-lem'broth), n. [Chal., lit.

key of art.] The salt of wisdom of the alchemists; a double chloride of mercury and ammonia, from which the old white precipitate of mercury is made. Although poisonous it was formerly used as a stimulant.

Alençon Lace (ä-läṅ-soṅ lās), n. A kind of French lace, with a six-sided mesh of two threads, made of pure, hand-spun linen thread; it is the richest, strongest, finest, and most expensive of the French laces, and is surpassed only by that of Brussels. It receives its name from Alençon, the chief town of the department of the Orne. Called also Alençon Point.

Alength† (a-length'), adv. [Prefix a, on, at, and length.] At full length; along; stretched at full length.

Alepidote (a-lep'i-dōt), a. [Gr. a, priv., and lepis, a scale.] Not having scales; as, an alepidote fish.

Alepidote (a-lep'i-dōt), n. Any fish whose skin is not covered with scales.

Ale-pole, Ale-post (āl'pōl, āl'pōst), n. See ALE-STAKE. The term ale-pole was sometimes applied to the May-pole.

Ale-pot (āl'pot), n. A pot or mug for holding ale.

Aleppine (a-lep'pīn), n. A native or inhabitant of Aleppo.

Alert (a-lėrt'), a. [Fr. alerte, alert, and (as noun) alarm or notice of danger, formerly allerte, and à l'erte, borrowed from It. all'erta, on the alert, lit. on or to the eminence, from all', to the, and erta, an acclivity, adj. erto, erect, from L. erectus, pp. of erigo, erectum, to erect.] 1. Active in vigilance; watchful; vigilant.

He was always alert. . . . to the claims of friendship. Rev. R. Graves.

2. Moving with celerity; brisk; nimble. 'An alert young fellow.' Addison.—SYN. Vigilant, watchful, heedful, brisk, nimble, active, lively, quick, prompt.

Alert (a-lėrt'), n. A position of vigilance; watch; guard: only in the phrase on or upon the alert, upon the watch; on the lookout; guarding against surprise or danger. 'The readiness of one on the alert.' Dickens.

Alertness (a-lėrt'nes), n. The state or quality of being alert; briskness; nimbleness; sprightliness. Addison.

Ale-scot,† Ale-shot† (āl'skot, āl'shot), n. [Ale, and scot, or its corrupted form shot, the quota of a tavern-bill. See SCOT.] A reckoning to be paid for ale.

Ale-silver (āl'sil-vėr), n. A duty anciently paid to the Lord-mayor of London by the sellers of ale within the city.

Ale-stake (āl'stāk), n. A stake having a garland or bush of twigs at the top of it, set up as a sign before an ale-house. Called also Ale-pole, Ale-post.

A garland had he sette upon his hede
As gret as it were for an ale-stake. Chaucer.

Ale-taster (āl'tāst-ėr). The same as Ale-conner (which see).

Alethiology (a-lē'thī-ol''o-ji), n. [Gr. aletheia, truth, and logos, discourse.] The doctrine of truth; the method of investigating the laws of truth. [Rare.]

Modified logic falls naturally into three parts. The first part treats of the nature of truth and error, and of the highest laws for their discrimination, Alethiology. Sir W. Hamilton.

Alette (a-let'), n. [Fr.; It. aletta, dim. of A, Arch. BB, Pillars. CC, Alettes.

L. ala, a wing.] In arch. a small wing of a building; a pilaster or buttress; the face of the pier of an arch, extending from the edge of the opening; but more particularly that portion betwixt the edge of the opening and the pillar or pilaster which is used to decorate the arch.

Aleurites (a-lū-rī'tēz), n. [Gr. aleurites, wheaten bread, from aleuron, wheaten flour—the plants being covered with a mealy substance.] A genus of plants, nat. order Euphorbiaceæ. The only species, A. triloba (the candle-berry tree), a tree 30 to 40 feet high, is a native of the Moluccas and some of the Pacific islands, and is cultivated in tropical countries for its nuts, which abound in oil, and when dried are used by the Polynesian islanders as a substitute for candles, whence they are called candle-nuts, or candle-berries.

Aleuromancy (a-lū'ro-man-si), n. [Gr. aleuron, meal, and manteia, divination.] A kind of divination by meal, practised by the ancients.

Aleurometer (a-lūr-om'e-tėr), n. [Gr. aleuron, wheaten flour, and metron, measure.] An instrument invented by M. Boland for indicating the bread-making qualities of wheaten flour. The indications depend upon the expansion of the gluten contained in a given quantity of flour when freed of its starch by pulverization and repeated washings with water.

Ale-vat (āl'vat), n. A vat in which ale is fermented.

Alew† (ā-lū'), n. Halloo; howling; lamentation.

Yet did she not lament with loud alew
As women wont. Spenser.

Ale-washed (āl'wosht), a. Steeped or soaked in ale. 'Ale-washed wits.' Shak.

Ale-wife (āl'wīf), n. pl. Ale-wives (āl'wīvz). A woman who keeps an ale-house.

Perhaps he will swagger and hector, and threaten to beat and butcher an ale-wife. Swift.

Alewife (āl'wīf), n. pl. Alewives (āl'wīvz). [Properly aloof, the Indian name of the fish.] A North American fresh-water fish (Alosa tyrannus), 8 to 10 inches long, resembling the shad, and taken in large numbers with that fish.

Alexanders (al-egz-an'dėrz), n. The English name of a genus of umbelliferous plants, Smyrnium (which see). Called also Alisander.

Alexandrian (al-egz-an'dri-an), a. Pertaining to Alexandria: often applied as an attribute to, or used as a noun for, one who professed or taught in connection with Alexandria, in Egypt.—Alexandrian Codex, an important manuscript of the Scriptures, in the British Museum, written on parchment in uncial characters. Its probable date is the fifth or sixth century.—Alexandrian Library, the largest collection of books of the ancient world, founded by Ptolemy Soter at Alexandria, in Egypt, and said to have contained 700,000 volumes of the literature of Rome, Greece, and Egypt. Supposed to have been ultimately destroyed by fanatic Arabs A.D. 641.

Alexandrine (al-egz-an'drīn), n. 1. A kind of verse consisting of twelve syllables in English poetry, or in French of twelve and thirteen in alternate couplets, and properly having the pause or break at the end of the third foot: so called from a poem written in French on the life of Alexander the Great. French tragedies are generally composed in Alexandrines. The last line of the following extract is an example.

A needless Alexandrine ends the song
That like a wounded snake drags its slow length along. Pope.

2. The name of several ancient medical preparations, especially a garlic plaster invented by an ancient physician of the name of Alexander. Dunglison.

Alexandrite (al-egz-an'drīt), n. [After Alexander I., emperor of Russia.] A variety of chrysoberyl found in the mica-slate of the Urals.

Alexipharmacal† (a-lek'si-färm''a-kal), a. Same as Alexipharmic. Dean Pierce.

Alexipharmic, Alexipharmical (a-lek'si-färm''ik, a-lek'si-färm''ik-al), a. [Gr. alexō, to ward off, pharmakon, a drug, remedy, poison.] 1. Acting as a means of warding off disease; acting as a remedy.—2. Having the power of warding off the effects of poison; acting as an antidote; antidotal.

Some antidotal quality it may have, since not only the bone in the heart, but the horn of a deer is alexipharmick. Sir T. Browne.

Alexipharmic (a-lek'si-färm''ik), n. 1. A medicine; a remedy.

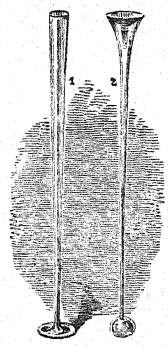
Finding his strength every day less, he was at last terrified, and called for help upon the sages of physic: they filled his apartments with alexipharmics, restoratives, and essential virtues. Johnson.

2. An antidote to poison or infection.

Alexiteric, Alexiterical (a-lek'si-ter''ik, a-lek'si-ter''ik-al), a. [Gr. alexō, to ward off, and dēlētērion, poison.] Resisting poison; obviating the effects of venomous animals.



1, Ale-yard.
2, Tricky Ale-yard.

Alexiteric (a-lek'si-ter''ik), n. A medicine to resist the effects of poison or the bite of venomous animals.

Ale-yard (āl'yärd), n. A very elongated form of drinking-glass and measure for ale formerly used. There were also half-yards and quarter-yards, for pints and half-pints respectively. A 'tricky' ale-yard was also used, in which the narrow end opened into a small globe, so contrived that, in the process of draining, the ale came out on the drinker's face with a spirt.

Alfa, Alfa-grass (al'fa, al'fa-gras), a. A North African name for Macrochloa arenaria and its fibre, one of the varieties of esparto.

Alfet (al'fet), n. [L.L. alfetum, from A. Sax. ælfæt, a pot to boil in—æl, fire, and fæt, a vat.] A vessel of boiling water into which an accused person plunged his arm as a test of his innocence or guilt.

Al fresco (äl fres'ko), a. [It.] In the open air; cool.

Alga (al'ga), n. [L.] A sea-weed; one of the Algæ.

Algæ (al'jē), n. pl. A nat. order of cryptogamic or thallogenous plants found for the most part in the sea and fresh water, comprising sea-weeds. The higher forms have stems bearing leaf-like expansions, and they are often attached to the rocks by roots which, however, do not take food from the rocks. The stem is most frequently absent, and the plant consists of the foliar expansion of one or more cells. They are nourished through their whole surface by the medium in which they live. The species vary in size from the microscopic diatoms to forms whose trunks exceed those of forest trees, and whose fronds rival the leaves of the palm. They are entirely composed of cellular tissue, and many are edible and nutritious, as carrageen or Irish-moss, dulse, &c. Kelp, iodine, and bromine are products of various species. The Algæ are also valuable as manure.

Algæ.

1, Dictyota elichotoma: a, Spore. b, Vertical view of a sorus. c, Vertical section of a sorus.
2, Plocamium coccineum: f, Tetraspore. g, Stichidium. h, Branchlet with a tubercle.

Algal (al'gal), n. One of the Algæ (which see).

Algal (al'gal), a. Of or pertaining to the Algæ; having the nature of the Algæ.

Alga-roba (al'ga-rō'ba), n. [Ar.] 1. The Arabic name of a tree, Ceratonia Siliqua. See CERATONIA.—2. The name in Panama for the tree Hymenæa Courbaril. See HYMENÆA.

Algarot, Algaroth (al'ga-rot, al'ga-roth), n. [From the name of the inventor, Algarotti, a celebrated physician of Verona.] A violently purgative and emetic white powder, which falls when chloride of antimony is dropped into water: it is a compound of chloride and oxide of antimony.

Algate, Algates (al'gāt, al'gāts), adv. [All, and (O.E. and Sc.) gate, a way; Icel. gata, a way. See GAIT, GATE.] 1. In every direction; everywhere. [Obsolete except in Scotch form a'gate or a'gates.]—2. In every respect; altogether; entirely. [Obsolete and northern provincial.]

Una now he algates must forego. Spenser.

3.† In any way; at all.

Fairer than herselfe, if aught algate
Might fayrer be. Spenser.

4.† By all means; on any terms.

And therefore would I should be algates slain;
For while I live his life is in suspense. Fairfax.

5.† Notwithstanding; nevertheless.

A maner latin corrupt was hir speche,
But algates ther-by was she understonde. Chaucer.

Algebra (al'je-bra), n. [Sp. algebra, Fr. algèbre, from Ar. al-gabr or al-jabr, the putting together of broken things, reduction of fractions to whole numbers, from Ar. gabara or jabara to bind together, to consolidate; the full name of the science in Arabic is al-gebr w-al-muqābalah, (the science of) reduction (or connection) and comparison.] That branch of mathematical analysis in which signs are employed to denote arithmetical operations, and letters are made to represent numbers and quantities; a kind of universal arithmetic. It takes an unknown quantity sought as if granted; and, by means of one or more quantities given, proceeds till the quantity supposed is discovered, by some other known quantity to which it is equal. It is necessary for explaining the foundations and investigating the rules of the more difficult parts of arithmetic; and by means of its symbols it affords directions for computation often more concise, and sometimes more perspicuous, than any which rules expressed in ordinary language can convey. It is divided into two branches—the first treating of equations involving unknown quantities having a determinate value; the other, called diophantine, or indeterminate analysis, treating of quantities having no fixed value, but depending in some degree on assumption. This science was of oriental discovery; but whether among the Arabians or Indians is uncertain.

Algebraic, Algebraical (al-je-brā'ik, al-je-brā'ik-al), a. Pertaining to algebra; containing an operation of algebra, or deduced from such operation.—Algebraic curve, a figure whose intercepted diameters bear always the same proportion to their respective ordinates.—Algebraic equation, an equation of which the terms contain only algebraic quantities.—Algebraic geometry, a name given to the application of algebra to the solution of geometrical problems.—Algebraic signs, certain signs or characters used in algebraical and mathematical operations, to denote the relations of numbers, magnitudes, and quantities; as, (=) equal to, (+) plus, (−) minus, (×) multiplied by, &c. See SIGN.

Algebraically (al-je-brā'ik-al-li), adv. By algebraic process.

Algebraist (al-je-brā'ist), n. One who is versed in the science of algebra.

Algebraize (al-je-brā'iz), v.t. To perform by algebra; to reduce to algebraic form.

Algerian (al-jē'ri-an), n. An inhabitant of the French province of Algeria.

Algerian (al-jē'ri-an), a. Pertaining to Algeria or its inhabitants.

Algerine (al-je-rēn'), n. 1. A native or inhabitant of Algiers, in Africa.—2. Hence, from the people of Algiers being much addicted to piracy, a pirate.

Algerine (al-je-rēn'), a. Of or pertaining to Algiers, or its inhabitants.

Algid (al'jid), a. [L. algidus, cold.] Cold.—Algid cholera, in med. Asiatic cholera, from diminution of temperature being one of its leading characteristics.

Algidity, Algidness (al-jid'i-ti, al'jid-nes), n. The state of being algid; chilliness; coldness.

Algific (al-jif'ik), a. [L. algificus—algus, cold, and facio, to make.] Producing cold.

Algol (al'gol), n. [Ar. al-ghūl, that is, the ghoul, namely Medusa.] A bright star, β Persei, called also β Medusæ, remarkable as being a 'variable' star, changing from the second or third magnitude to the fifth in 2 days 20 hours 50 minutes.

Algology (al-gol'o-ji), n. [L. alga, a seaweed, and Gr. logos, discourse.] A discourse or treatise on algæ or sea-weeds; the study or science of algæ.

Algor (al'gor), n. In med. an unusual coldness in the human system; rigor or chill on the onset of fever.

Algorithm, Algorism (al'gō-rithm, al'gō-rizm), n. [Fr. algorithme, O. Fr. algorisme, Sp. algoritmo, O. Sp. alguarismo—Ar. al, the, and a noun formed from Gr. arithmos, number.] The art of computing or reckoning in reference to some particular subject, or in some particular way; as, the algorithm of numbers; the algorithm of the differential calculus.

Algose (al'gōs), a. [L. algosus, from algus, cold.] Cold in a high degree. Bailey.

Algous (al'gus), a. Pertaining to or resembling the algæ or sea-weeds; abounding with sea-weed.

Algrim† (al'grim), n. [See ALGORITHM. The etymology given in the extract below is curious.] An ancient name for arithmetic.

The name of this craft is in Latin algorismus, and in English algrim; and it is named of algos, that is to say, craft, and rismus, that is, nounbre; and for this skille it is called craft of nounbringe. Old MS.

Alguazil (äl-gwä-zēl''), n. [Pg. alguacil, alvacil, alvazil, alvasir, Sp. alguacil, from Ar. al wazir, the vizier.] In Spain, an inferior officer of justice; a constable.

The corregidor . . . has sent this alguazil to apprehend you. Smollett.

Algum. See ALMUG.

Alhagi (al-hā'ji), n. [Ar., the camel's-thorn.] A genus of Leguminosæ, sub-order Papilionaceæ, containing several species, inhabiting southern Asia and western Africa. A. Camelorum is the true camel's-thorn. The leaves and branches of A. Maurorum, an evergreen shrub in Persia and Bokhara, exude manna in hot weather, which, when it hardens, is obtained by merely shaking the branches. This sweet secretion of the Persian and Bokharan plant is much prized by the Afghans as food for cattle, camels especially being fond of it.

Alhambraic, Alhambresque (äl-äm-brā'ik, äl-äm'bresk), a. [The Alhambra (from Ar. al, the, and ahmar, fem. hamrā, red; lit. the red house) is a Moorish palace and fortress near Granada, in Spain, founded by Mohammed I. of Granada, about 1253, and presenting the finest existing specimen of Moorish or Arabesque architecture.] Of or pertaining to the Alhambra; built or decorated after the fanciful manner of the Alhambra. The style of the Alhambra is remarkable for the elaborate complexity and variety of its details, in which all animal forms are omitted, and vegetable or floral ones so far modified as to distantly resemble nature. See ARABESQUE.

Alhenna (al-hen'na), n. Henna (which see).

Aliaceous (al-i-ā'shus), a. Same as Alliaceous.

Alias (ā'li-as), adv. [L., elsewhere, otherwise.] At another time; in another place; in other circumstances; otherwise: a word used in judicial proceedings to connect the different names by which a person is called who attempts to conceal his true name and pass under a fictitious one: thus, Simson alias Smith, means a person calling himself at one time or one place Smith, at another Simson.

Alias (ā'li-as), n. pl. Aliases (ā'li-as-ez). 1. In law, formerly a second writ, or execution, issued when the first has failed to enforce the judgment.—2. An assumed name; another name.

An author was forced to assume every week new aliases and new disguises. Macaulay.

Alibi (al'i-bī), adv. [L.] In law, elsewhere; at another place.

The prisoner had little to say in his defence; he endeavoured to prove himself alibi. Arbuthnot.

Alibi (al'i-bī), n. In law, a plea, allegation, or defence which avers that the accused was in another place at the time of the commission of the offence.

Alible† (al'i-bl), a. [L. alibilis, from alo, to nourish.] 1. Nutritive.—2. That may be nourished.

Alicante, Alicant (al-i-kan'tā, al'i-kant), n. [From Alicante, a town in Valentia, Spain, where it is made.] A strong, sweet, dark-coloured Spanish wine; also known as Vino tinto.

Alidade (al'i-dād), n. [Sp. alidada, alhidada, from Ar. al-idāda.] The movable arm of a graduated instrument, as a quadrant, astrolabe, or theodolite, carrying sights or a telescope, by which an angle is measured from a base-line observed through the stationary or level line of sights.

Alien (āl'yen), a. [L. alienus, alien, from alius, another. The same root appears in E. else (which see).] 1. Not belonging to the same country, land, or government, or to the citizens or subjects thereof; foreign; as, alien subjects; alien property.—2. Wholly different in nature; estranged; foreign; adverse; hostile.

They encouraged persons and principles, alien from our religion and government, in order to strengthen their faction. Swift.

—Alien water, any stream of water carried across an irrigated field or meadow, but which is not employed in the process of irrigation.

Alien (āl'yen), n. 1. A foreigner; one born in or belonging to another country; one who is not a denizen, or entitled to the privileges of a citizen. In France, a child born of residents who are not citizens is an alien. In Great Britain, the children of aliens born in that country are mostly natural born subjects, and the children of British subjects owing allegiance to the crown of England, though born in other countries, are natural subjects, and entitled to the privileges of resident citizens.—2. A stranger. 'Who can not have been altogether an alien from the researches of your lordship.' Landor. [Rare.]

Alien (āl'yen), v.t. 1. To transfer or convey, as title or property, to another.

If the son alien lands, and then repurchase them again in fee, the rules of descents are to be observed, as if he were the original purchaser. Sir M. Hale.

2. To make averse or indifferent; to turn the affections or inclinations of; to estrange.

The prince was totally alienedd from all thoughts of, or inclination to, the marriage. Clarendon.

Alienability (āl'yen-a-bil''i-ti), n. The state or quality of being alienable; the capacity of being alienated or transferred. 'The alienability of the domain.' Burke.

Alienable (āl'yen-a-bl), a. Capable of being alienated, sold, or transferred to another; as, land is alienable according to the laws of the state.

Alienage (āl'yen-āj), n. 1. The state of being an alien.

Why restore estates forfeitable on account of alienage? Story.

2. The state of being alienated or transferred to another; alienation.

The provinces were treated in a far more harsh manner than the Italian states, even in the latter period of their alienage. Brougham.

Alienate (āl'yen-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. alienated; ppr. alienating. [L. alieno, alienatum, to alienate, from alienus. See ALIEN, a.] 1. To transfer or convey, as title, property, or other right, to another; as, to alienate lands or sovereignty.—2. To withdraw, as the affections; to make indifferent or averse, where love or friendship before subsisted; to estrange; to wean: with from before the secondary object.

The nephew might alienate as many hearts by trying to make England a military country, as the uncle had alienated by trying to make her a Roman Catholic country. Macaulay.

The recollection of his former life is a dream that only the more alienates him from the realities of the present. Is. Taylor.

Alienate (āl'yen-āt), a. [L. alienatus. See the verb.] Estranged; withdrawn; stranger to: with from.

O alienate from God, O spirit accurst! Milton.

The Whigs were alienate from truth. Swift.

Alienate† (āl'yen-āt), n. A stranger; an alien.

Whosoever eateth the lamb without this house, he is an alienate. Stapleton.

Alienation (āl-yen-ā'shon), n. [L. alienatio.] The act of alienating or the state of being alienated: (a) in law, a transfer of title, or a legal conveyance of property to another. (b) A withdrawing or estrangement, as of the heart or affections. 'Alienation of heart from the king.' Bacon. (c) Deprivation, or partial deprivation, as of mental faculties; wandering; derangement; insanity. 'Alienation of mind.' Hooker.

Alienator (āl-yen-ā'tėr), n. One who alienates or transfers property.

Aliene (āl-yēn'), v.t. Same as Alien.

Alienee (āl-yen-ē'), n. One to whom the title of property is transferred. 'If the alienee enters and keeps possession.' Blackstone.

Alienism (āl'yen-izm), n. The state of being an alien.

The law was very gentle in the construction of the disability of alienism. Ch. Kent.

Alienor (āl'yen-or), n. One who transfers property to another.

Alife† (a-līf'), adv. [Prefix a, on, and life.] On my life.

A clean instep,
And that I love, alife! Beau. & Fl.

Aliferous (a-lif'ėr-us), a. [L. ala, wing, and fero, to bear.] Having wings.

Aliform (ā'li-form), a. [L. ala, wing, and forma, shape.] Having the shape of a wing or wings; in anat. a term applied to the pterygoid processes and the muscles associated with them. See PTERYGOID.

Aligant† (al'i-gant), n. Wine of Alicante in Spain. 'Three pottles of Aligant.' Dekker.

Aligerous (a-lij'ėr-us), a. [L. ala, wing, and gero, to carry.] Having wings.

Alight (a-līt'), v.i. [A. Sax. álihtan, gelihtan, to alight or light. See the verb LIGHT in this sense.] 1. To get down or descend, as from horseback or from a carriage.—2. To fall or descend and settle or lodge; as, a bird alights on a tree; snow alights on a roof.

But storms of stones from the proud temple's height
Pour down, and on our batter'd helms alight.
Dryden.

Alight (a-līt'), a. or adv. [Prefix a, on, in, or into, and light (which see).] 1. Lighted up. 'The lamps were alight.' Dickens.—2. Into light. 'He pretended to be blowing it alight again.' Dickens.

Align (a-līn'), v.t. [Fr. aligner, to align—a for ad, to, and ligne, L. linea, a line.] To adjust to a line; to lay out or regulate by a line; to form in line, as troops.

Alignment (a-līn'ment), n. [Fr.] 1. The act of aligning; the act of laying out or regulating by a line; an adjusting to a line; the state of being so adjusted; the line of adjustment; the line on which troops are formed in battle order.—2. In engin. the ground-plan of a railway or other road, in distinction from the gradients or profile.

Alike (a-līk'), a. [Prefix a, and like; A. Sax. gelic, alike. See LIKE.] Having resemblance or similitude; similar; without difference.

In birth, in acts, in arms alike the rest. Fairfax.

The darkness and the light are both alike to thee.
Ps. cxxxix. 12.

[This adjective never precedes the noun which it qualifies.]

Alike (a-līk'), adv. In the same manner, form, or degree; in common.

He fashioneth their hearts alike. Ps. xxxiii. 15.

However true it may be that all alike have sinned, it is far from true that all have sinned alike.
Contemporary Review.

Alike-minded (a-līk'mīnd-ed), a. Having the same mind; like-minded. Bp. Hall.

Aliment (al'i-ment), v.t. In Scots law, to maintain or support, as a person unable to support himself: used especially in reference to the mutual obligation of parents and children to support each other.

Aliment (al'i-ment), n. [L. alimentum, nourishment—alo, to nourish, a verbal stem seen also in Icel. ala, to nourish; Goth. alan, to grow, aljan, to nourish; Gael. al, food, nurture.] That which nourishes; food; nutriment; anything which feeds or adds to a substance, animal or vegetable, in natural growth; specifically (Scots law), the sum paid for support to any one entitled to claim it, as the dole paid to a pauper by his parish.

The aliment was appointed to continue till the majority or marriage of the daughters.
Erskine's Inst.

Alimental (al-i-ment'al), a. Of or pertaining to aliment; supplying food; having the quality of nourishing; furnishing the materials for natural growth; as, chyle is alimental; alimental sap.

Alimentally (al-i-ment'al-li), adv. In an alimental manner; so as to serve for nourishment or food.

Alimentariness (al-i-ment'a-ri-nes), n. The quality of being alimentary, or of supplying nutriment.

Alimentary (al-i-ment'a-ri), a. Pertaining to aliment or food; having the quality of nourishing; as, alimentary particles.—Alimentary canal, in anat. the great duct or intestine in an animal body, from which the alimentary portion of the food is absorbed into the system, the useless parts being carried off by it.—Alimentary debt, in Scots law, a debt incurred for necessaries or maintenance.—Alimentary fund, a fund set apart by the destination of the giver for an aliment to the receiver. If not unreasonable for the rank of the receiver it is not arrestable by creditors.

Alimentation (al'i-ment-ā''shon), n. 1. The act or power of affording nutriment.—2. The state of being nourished.

Alimentiveness (al-i-ment'iv-nes), n. In phren. the organ that is said to communicate the pleasure which arises from eating and drinking, and which prompts us to take nourishment. Its supposed seat is in the zygomatic fossa.

Alimonious (al-i-mō'ni-us), a. [See ALIMONY.] Affording food; nourishing; nutritive. 'Alimonious humours.' Harvey. [Rare.]

Alimony (al'i-mo-ni), n. [L. alimonia, from alo, to feed. See ALIMENT.] In law, (a) an allowance out of her husband's estate made for the support of a woman legally separated from him when she is not charged with adultery or wilful desertion. (b) In Scots law, aliment. Erskine.

Alineation (a-lin'ē-ā''shon), n. [L. a, by or from, and linea, a line.] The determination or ready recognition of the position of a more remote object, by following a line drawn through one or more intermediate and more easily recognizable objects, and imagined to be produced.

A method of determining the positions of the stars, susceptible of a little more exactness than the former, is the use of alineations, already noticed in speaking of Hipparchus' catalogue. Thus a straight line passing through two stars of the Great Bear passes also through the pole-star. Whewell.

Alioth (al'i-oth), n. [The Arabic name.] A star in the tail of the Great Bear (ε Ursæ), much used in finding the latitude. Also the very bright star Capella (α Aurigæ), in the constellation Auriga, or charioteer.

Aliped (ā'li-pēd or al'i-ped), a. [L. ala, wing, and pes, pedis, a foot.] 1. Wing-footed; having the toes connected by a membrane, which serves as a wing, as the bats.—2. † Swift of foot.

Aliped (ā'li-pēd or al'i-ped), n. An animal whose toes are connected by a membrane, serving for a wing; a cheiropter, as the bat.

Aliquant (al'i-kwant), a. [L. aliquantum, somewhat.] In arith. applied to a number which does not measure another without a remainder. Thus 5 is an aliquant part of 16, for 3 times 5 are 15, leaving a remainder 1.

Aliquot (al'i-kwot), a. [L. aliquot, some, several.] In arith. applied to a part of a number or quantity which will measure it without a remainder. Thus 5 is an aliquot part of 15.

Alisander (a-li-san'dėr), n. Same as Alexanders.

Alish (ā'lish), a. Like ale; having the qualities of ale. 'A sweet alish taste.' Mortimer.

Alisma (a-liz'ma), n. [Gr. alisma, water-plantain.] A genus of plants belonging to the nat. order Alismaceæ; water-plantain. All the species are aquatic; one, A. Plantago, the common water-plantain, is common in ditches in Britain. See WATER-PLANTAIN.

Alismaceæ (al-iz-mā'sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of endogenous plants, growing in water or in marshes.

Alitrunk (ā'li-trungk or al'i-trungk), n. [L. ala, a wing, and truncus, a trunk.] The segment of the posterior thorax of an insect to which the wings and two posterior pairs of legs are attached.

Alive (a-līv'), a. [Prefix a for on, and life; in Old English it was written on live, on lyve, where live, lyve is a dat. form of life.] 1. Having life, in opposition to dead; being in a state in which the organs perform their functions; living; as, the man or plant is alive.—2. In a state of action; in force or operation; unextinguished; undestroyed; unexpired; as, keep the process alive.—3. Full of alacrity; cheerful; sprightly; lively; as, the company were all alive.—4. Keenly interested in and watchful after; having lively feelings; easily impressed; sensitive to; susceptible; as, he is sufficiently alive to the beauties of nature, but yet more alive to his own interests.—5. Exhibiting motion or moving bodies in great numbers; as, the city was all alive when the general entered. 6. Of all living, by way of emphasis.

The Earl of Northumberland was the proudest man alive. Clarendon.

[Alive always follows the noun which it qualifies.]

Alizarine (al'i-za-rin), n. [Fr. alizarine, from alizari, the commercial name of madder in the Levant, from the (Ar.) root of azure, with the article prefixed.] ($C_{14}H_8O_4$.) A peculiar red colouring matter obtained from madder. It has been prepared artificially from coal-tar residues, which contain a substance called anthracene ($C_{14}H_{10}$). The elimination of hydrogen from, and addition of oxygen to, this body gives rise to the formation of alizarine.

Alk (ąlk), n. A resin obtained from Pistacia terebinthus.

Alkahest (al'ka-hest), n. [Etym. unknown.] The pretended universal solvent or menstruum of the alchemists.

Alkahestic (al-ka-hest'ik), a. Pertaining to the alkahest.

Alkalescency (al-ka-les'en-si), n. [See ALKALI.] A tendency to become alkaline; a tendency to the properties of an alkali; the state of a substance in which alkaline properties begin to be developed or to be predominant. Ure.

Alkalescent (al-ka-les'ent), a. Tending to the properties of an alkali; slightly alkaline.

Alkali (al'ka-li), n. pl. Alkalies or Alkalis (al'ka-liz). [Sp. Fr. alcali, Ar. al-qali, the ashes of the plant from which soda was first obtained, or the plant itself—Ar. al, the, and qalaj, to roast.] A term first used to designate the soluble part of the ashes of plants, especially of sea-weed. Now applied to various classes of bodies having the following properties in common:—(1) solubility in water; (2) the power of neutralizing acids, and forming salts with them; (3) the property of corroding animal and vegetable substances; (4) the property of altering the tint of many colouring matters—thus, they turn litmus, reddened by an acid, into blue; turmeric, brown; and syrup of violets and infusion of red cabbages, green. The alkalies are hydrates, or water in which half the hydrogen is replaced by a metal or compound radical. In its restricted and common sense the term is applied to four substances only: hydrate of potassium (potash), hydrate of sodium (soda), hydrate of lithium (lithia), and hydrate of ammonium (an aqueous solution of ammonia). In a more general sense it is applied to the hydrates of the so-called alkaline earths (baryta, strontia, and lime), and to a large number of organic substances, both natural and artificial, described under ALKALOID.

Alkalifiable (al'ka-li-fī-a-bl or al-kal'i-fī-a-bl), a. Capable of being alkalified or converted into an alkali.

Alkalify (al'ka-li-fī or al-kal'i-fī), v.t. pret. & pp. alkalified; ppr. alkalifying. [Alkali, and L. facio, to make.] To form or to convert into an alkali; to alkalize.

Alkalify (al'ka-li-fī or al-kal'i-fī), v.i. To become an alkali.

Alkaligenous (al-ka-lij'en-us), a. [Alkali, and Gr. gennaō, to generate.] Producing or generating alkali.

Alkalimeter (al-ka-lim'et-ėr), n. [Alkali, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the strength of alkalies, or the quantity of alkali in caustic potash and soda, by the quantity of dilute sulphuric acid, of a known strength, which a certain weight of them would neutralize. Ure.

Alkalimetric, Alkalimetrical (al'ka-li-met''rik, al'ka-li-met''rik-al), a. Relating to alkalimetry.

Alkalimetry (al-ka-lim'et-ri), n. The finding of the amount of real alkali in an alkaline mixture or liquid. This may be done by volumetric analysis, that is, by estimating the amount of a standard acid solution which the alkaline mixture will saturate; or by gravimetric analysis, that is, by decomposing the substance and finding the weight of the alkali contained in it. Ure.

Alkalimide (al-kal'i-mīd), n. [Alkali and amide.] Ammonia in which two or more atoms of hydrogen are replaced by acid and base radicals. See AMIDE, AMINE.

Alkaline (al'ka-lin), a. Having the properties of an alkali. — Alkaline earths, lime, magnesia, baryta, strontia. See ALKALI.— Alkaline development, in photog. the development of collodionized sensitive plates by an alkali, or an alkaline salt, combined with pyrogallic acid. To insure success all salts of silver soluble in water must be absent, otherwise the picture is foggy.

Alkalinity (al-ka-lin'i-ti), n. The state of being alkaline; the quality which constitutes an alkali.

Alkalious (al-kā'li-us), a. Having the properties of alkali. [Rare.]

Alkalizate (al'kal-īz-āt or al-kal'iz-āt), v.t. To make bodies alkaline. [Rare.] See ALKALIZE.

Alkalization (al'ka-liz-ā''shon), n. The act or process of rendering alkaline by impregnating with an alkali.

Alkalize (al'ka-līz), v.t. pret. & pp. alkalized; ppr. alkalizing. To make alkaline; to communicate the properties of an alkali to; to alkalify.

Alkaloid (al'ka-loid), n. [From alkali, and Gr. eidos, likeness.] A term applied to a class of nitrogenized compounds found in living plants, and containing their active principles, usually in combination with organic acids. They generally end in in or ine, as morphine, quinine, aconitine, caffeine, &c. Most alkaloids occur in plants, but some are formed by decomposition. Their alkaline character depends on the nitrogen they contain. Most natural alkaloids contain carbon, hydrogen, nitrogen, and oxygen, but the greater number of artificial ones want the oxygen. The only property common to all alkaloids is that of combining with acids to form salts, and some exhibit an alkaline reaction with colours. Alkaloids form what is termed the organic bases of plants. Although formed originally within the plant, it has been found possible to prepare several of these alkaloids by purely artificial means.

Alkaloid (al'ka-loid), a. Relating to or containing alkali.

Alkanet (al'ka-net), n. [Sp. alcaneta, dim. of alcana, alcanna, from Ar. al-hinna, henna.] A boraginaceous plant, Alkanna (Anchusa of some writers) tinctoria. The root is used to impart a deep red colour to oily substances, ointments, plasters, &c. It is sometimes employed in the adulteration of port-wine.

Alkanna (al-kan'na), n. [Ar. al-hinna, henna.] 1. A genus of Mediterranean and oriental plants, nat. order Boraginaceæ, closely allied to Lithospermum and Anchusa, in which latter genus it is included by some botanists. It differs from Lithospermum only in having the four small nuts which form its fruit contracted at the base, and from Anchusa in not having the nuts excavated at the base, and in having no scales closing the mouth of the corolla. Alkanet (which see) belongs to this genus. 2. Henna.

Alkarsine (al-kär'sin), n. An extremely poisonous liquid containing kakodyle, together with oxidation products of this substance, and formerly known as Cadet's fuming liquor, characterized by its insupportable smell and high degree of spontaneous combustibility when exposed to air. From this latter quality and the poisonous fumes which it evolves it has been proposed to employ it as a deadly agent in war. A shell filled with it would, in bursting, it is said, involve a ship in fire and destroy the crew by its vapour. See KAKODYLE.

Alkekengi (al-kē-ken'ji), n. [Ar. al-kākenj, a kind of resin obtained near Herat.] The winter-cherry, a solanaceous plant called Physalis Alkekengi. The scarlet fruit inclosed in the enlarged red calyx makes the plant very ornamental in the beginning of winter. The fruit is edible, and has a slightly acid taste.

Alkenna, Alhenna (al-ken'na, al-hen'na), n. Same as Henna.

Alkermes (al-kėr'mēz), n. [Ar. See KERMES.] The name of a once celebrated compound cordial, to which a fine red colour was given by kermes. Its ingredients are said to have been cider, rose-water, sugar, and various fragrant flavouring matters.

Alkohol (al'kō-hol). Same as Alcohol.

Alkoholic (al-kō-hol'ik), a. Same as Alcoholic.

Alkoran (al'kō-ran or al-kō-rạn'), n. [Ar. al, the, and korân, reading, book, from qarâ, to read, to teach; the Book by way of eminence, as we say the Bible (Gr. biblos, a book).] The book which contains the religious and moral code of the Mohammedans, and by which indeed all their transactions, civil, legal, military, &c., are regulated; the Koran. It was written by Mohammed, and is considered to present the purest specimen of the classical Arabic, which, however, is very different from the spoken Arabic of modern times.

Alkoran, Alcoran (al'kō-ran), n. A high tower on Persian buildings.

Alkoranish (al-kō-ran'ish or al-kō-rạn'ish), a. Pertaining to the Koran or Alkoran, or to Mohammedanism.

Alkoranist (al-kō-ran'ist or al-kō-rạn'ist), n. One who adheres strictly to the letter of the Koran, rejecting all comments. The Persians are generally Alkoranists; the Turks, Arabs, and Tartars admit a multitude of traditions.

All (ạl), a. [A. Sax. eal, eall, al, Icel. allr, Goth. alls, G. all, all. Common to all the Teutonic tongues. Grimm is inclined to regard all as akin to W. oll, Armor. holl, Gr. holos, Oscan sollus, L. salvus, Skr. sarva, all, whole. In this view all would be of similar origin with E. safe, from Fr. sauf, and that from L. salvus.] 1. Every one of; the whole number of, with reference to individuals or particulars, taken collectively; as, all men, all the men. — 2. The whole quantity of, with reference to extent, duration, amount, quality, or degree; as, all the wheat; all the land; all the year; all the strength; in all probability; to all appearance.—3. It was sometimes used formerly for any. 'Without all doubt' (that is, without any particle of doubt). Shak.

> In like manner shalt thou do with his ass; and so shalt thou do with his raiment; and with all lost thing of thy brother's. Deut. xxii. 3.

4.† Only; alone. 'Thou art all my child' (my only child). Shak. This, however, may be the use of the word in the extract quoted after ALL, adv., 3. When joined to nouns accompanied by the definite article or a possessive or demonstrative pronoun, the article or pronoun comes between it and the noun; as, all my labour; all his goods; all these things. In all day, all night, all the summer, &c., all means during the whole, and the phrases are a kind of adverbial accusatives. The article is generally omitted before day and night, though sometimes inserted as more emphatic.

> We will sing to you all the day. Tennyson.

[The definite article is for the most part omitted in Shakspere both before day and night; in the authorized version of the Bible it is in the great majority of cases supplied before day and omitted before night.]—Such phrases as two (or twos) all, three all, six all, are used in certain games to signify that all the players are equal, and they are used even when there are no more than two persons or sides engaged in the game. —For all, an elliptical expression, meaning (a) for all times; for all occasions in the future. 'Learn now for all . . . I care not for you.' Shak. [Now used only in the phrase once for all. See FOR, 1.] (b) For all the fact that; notwithstanding; although. 'For all you are my man.' Shak. See FOR, 21. All is sometimes found redundantly in the phrase all the whole.

> But all the whole inheritance I give. Shak.

See another example in extract under AGAZED.

All (ạl), adv. 1. Wholly; completely; entirely; altogether; quite; as, all bedewed; my friend is all for amusement; it is all gone.

> He rode all unarmed, and he rode all alone. Scott.

In such antique uses (chiefly ballad) as, 'he thought them sixpence all too dear,' all appears to retain its appropriate sense, though in some cases it is nearly pleonastic, or serves only to add a little force to the expression. 'When all aloud the wind doth blow.' Shak.

> A damsel lay deploring
> All on a rock reclined. Gay.

Perhaps we may also class here such usages as where the all seems to draw attention more strongly to a period of time; as, 'All in the mornynge tyde;' 'All in the month of May.' Comp. all as below. In the following passage—

> And a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech's head and all to brake his skull. Judg. ix. 53.

all is an adverb equivalent to altogether, while the to belongs to the verb following, being commonly used as an intensive prefix to verbs by writers of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries; thus, 'he to-brac the rock.' Wickliffe. Ps. cv. 41, which in the common version stands 'he opened the rock.'—2.† Although; as, 'all were it as the rest.' Spenser.—3.† Only; exclusively. 'I shall never marry like my sisters to love my father all.' Shak.—All as, (a) when; as; just when. 'All as his straying flocks he fed.' Spenser. [Obsolete or poetical.]

> He their courtesy to requite,
> Gave them a chain of twelve marks weight,
> All as he lighted down. Sir W. Scott.

(b)† As if.

> The kene cold blowes through my beaten hide,
> All as I were through the body gryde. Spenser.

—All but, nearly; almost; not quite; as, she is all but nine years of age.—All one, the same thing in effect; quite the same.

> Yet I have the wit to think that my master is a kind of a knave; but that's all one if he be but one knave. Shak.

—All over, thoroughly; entirely; as, 'Dombey and Son' is Dickens all over. [Colloq.] —All out [O.E. and slang], entirely; quite. 'Then come these wykkade Jewes and slewe them all out.' Old MS. quoted by Halliwell. —All the, to all that extent; as, all the better; all the fitter; all the sooner. See THE. —All there [Slang], up to the mark; wide-awake; in strict fashion; first-rate.

All (ạl), n. 1. The whole number; as, all have not the same disposition; that is, all men, or all of a certain number in the mind of the speaker.—2. The whole; the entire thing; the aggregate; the total.

> And Laban said, All that thou seest is mine. Gen. xxxi. 43.

3. One's whole property; as, she has given her all.—And all, and everything else, after an enumeration of particulars; as, the tree fell, nest, young, and all. [This phrase does not necessarily imply that there is anything else than what is mentioned.]—At all, a phrase used by way of enforcement in negative and interrogative and sometimes other sentences or clauses of a negative import, and meaning, in the least degree, to the least extent, under any circumstances; as, he had no time at all at his disposal; have you any friends at all? (the interrogator implying that he does not believe the person addressed has any). 'An if this be at all' (where the speaker implies a doubt that there is no truth in what he has heard). Shak. —When all comes to all, in final result.— All and some, (a) all and sundry, one and all.

> Stop your noses, readers, all and some. Dryden.

(b) Altogether; wholly. [Obsolete in both senses.]—All in all. See ALL-IN-ALL.—All in the wind (navt.), a phrase implying that the vessel's head is too close to the wind, so that the sails are shivering.—In all, everything reckoned or taken into account; all included; as, there were in all at least 400 persons present.—All, in composition, enlarges the meaning or adds force to a word, and it is generally more emphatical than most. In some instances all is incorporated into words, as in almighty, already, always; but in most instances it is prefixed to other words, but separated by a hyphen. As a prefix it has sometimes the force of an adverb; as, all-powerful, all-perfect, all-important; sometimes of a noun in the objective case; as, all-seeing; sometimes perhaps of a noun in the instrumental case; as, 'all-disgraced,' 'all-dreaded' (Shak.) = disgraced, dreaded by all, or entirely, wholly, disgraced, dreaded.

Alla (äl'lä). [It., dat. of the fem. art. la = Fr. à la.] In music, after the manner of; in the style of; as, alla francese, in the French style or manner.

Alla-breve (al'la-brēv or äl'lä-brā-vā). [It.] In music, a term signifying a quick time, in which the notes take much less than their usual length.

Alla-capella (äl'lä-ka-pel''la). [It., according to the chapel.] In music, in the ecclesiastical style.

Allagite (al'la-jīt), n. A mineral, of a brown or green colour, massive, with a flat conchoidal fracture, and nearly opaque, found in the Hartz, near Elbingerode.

Allah (al'la), n. [Ar. allah, God—al, the, and ilâh, a god; allied to Heb. el, God.] The Arabic name of the Supreme Being, which, through the Koran, has found its way into the languages of all nations who have embraced the Mohammedan faith.

All-along (al-a-long'), adv. Throughout; continuously; uninterruptedly; from the beginning onwards; as, I knew that all-along.

All-amort (äl-ä-mort'), a. See A-LA-MORT, AMORT.

Allanite (al'lan-īt), n. [Named after Mr. Allan, of Edinburgh, the discoverer.] ($R_3O\,Si_2\,O_2 + R_2O_3\,Si\,O_2$.) An ore of the metals cerium and lanthanium, having a pitch-black or brownish colour.

Allantoic (al-lan-tō'ik), a. Pertaining to or contained in the allantois.—Allantoic acid, a white crystallizable acid of animal origin found in the liquor of the allantois of the fetal calf: formerly called Amniotic Acid.

Allantoid, Allantoidal (al-lan'toid, al-lan-toid'al), a. Of or pertaining to the allantois; as, the allantoid membrane.

Allantoin, Allantoine (al-lan'tō-in), n. ($C_4H_6N_4O_3$.) A crystalline substance found in the allantoic fluid of the cow.

Allantois, Allantoid (al-lan'tois, al-lan'-toid), n. [Gr. allas, allantos, a sausage, and eidos, form.] A pyriform sac developed from the posterior end of the abdominal cavity in vertebrate embryos. In mammals, as man, it elongates and becomes the stalk of the placenta, or the umbilical cord along which vessels pass connecting the circulation of mother and offspring. The lower end of the allantoid sac remains through life as the urinary bladder. In birds and reptiles it comes to envelop the whole embryo within the shell, and acts as a respiratory organ. In amphibians and fishes its relations are imperfectly known, but it is probably present in all.

Allantotoxicum (al-lan'tō-toks"i-kum), n. [Gr. allas, allantos, a sausage, and toxicon, poison.] Sausage poison; a poison found in putrid sausages made of blood and liver.

Alla prima (äl'lä prē'mä), n. [It.] A method of painting in which the pigments are applied all at once to the canvas, without impasting or retouching.

Allatrate† (al'la-trāt), v.t. [L. allatro, allatratum, to bark at.] To bark out; to utter by barking.

> Let Cerberus, the dog of hell, allatrate what he list to the contrary. Stubbes.

Allaud† (al-ląd'), v.t. [L. allaudo—al for ad, to, and laudo, to praise.] To praise.

Allay (al-lā'), v.t. [Under this form two words seem to have become fused together; the one, which would more properly be spelled with one l, from A. Sax. alecgan, to lay down, suppress, tranquillize, as to allay thirst, grief, &c., from prefix á, and lecgan, to lay (see LAY); the other from Fr. alléger, Pr. aleujar, alleviar, to lighten, assuage, from L. L. alleviare, L. allevare, to alleviate—al for ad, and levis, light. For change of L. vi into Fr. g, see ABRIDGE. In Old English there are forms, such as alegge, allegge, alege, that might belong to either.] 1. To make quiet; to pacify or appease; as, to allay the tumult of the passions, or to allay civil commotions.—2. To abate, mitigate, subdue, or destroy; to relieve or alleviate; as, to allay grief or pain; to allay the bitterness of affliction.

> Yet leave me not! I would allay that grief
> Which else might thy young virtue overpower.
> Beattie.

SYN. To check, repress, assuage, appease, abate, subdue, destroy, compose, soothe, calm, quiet, alleviate.

Allay (al-lā'), v.i. To abate; to subside; to grow calm. 'When the rage allays.' Shak.

Allay (al-lā'), n. That which allays, lightens, or alleviates.

> Friendship is the allay of our sorrow. Jer. Taylor.

Allay† (al-lā'), v.t. [See ALLOY.] To reduce the purity of; as, to allay metals: in this sense alloy is now exclusively used. See ALLOY.

Allay† (al-lā'), n. 1. Act or process of alloying.

> Coins are hardened by the allay. Hudibras.

2. Mixture; dilution. 'French wine with an allay of water.' B. Jonson.

Allayer (al-lā'ér), n. One who or that which allays.

> Phlegm and pure blood are the reputed allayers of acrimony. Harvey.

Allayment (al-lā'ment), n. The act of quieting, or a state of tranquillity; a state of rest after disturbance; abatement; ease. 'The like allayment could I give my grief.' Shak.

All-be† (al-bē'), conj. Although. Spenser.

Allecret (al'lē-kret), n. [Fr. alecret, hallecret.] A kind of light armour, used in the sixteenth century, and more especially by the Swiss. It consisted of a breast-plate and back-plate, lighter than a cuirass, with tassets reaching nearly to the knee.

Allecret Armour, A.D. 1540.

Allect† (al-lekt'), v.t. [Lat. allecto, freq. from allicio, allectum, to entice.] To entice. Chaucer.

Allectation† (al-lek-tā'shon), n. Enticement; allurement.

Allective† (al-lekt'iv), a. Alluring. 'Allective bait.' Chaucer.

Allective† (al-lekt'iv), n. Allurement.

> What better allective could Lucifer devise to allure men pleasantly into damnable servitude?
> Sir T. Elyot.

Alledge (al-lej'), v.t. Same as Allege.

Allegant,† n. Same as Aligant.

Allegation (al-lē-gā'shon), n. 1. The act of alleging; affirmation; declaration. 'Erroneous allegations of fact.' Hallam.—2. That which is affirmed or asserted; that which is offered as a plea, excuse, or justification.

> I expect not to be excused . . . on account of youth, want of leisure, or any other idle allegations.
> Pope.

3. In law, the assertion or statement of a party to a suit or other proceeding, civil or criminal, which he undertakes to prove. The word is especially used in ecclesiastical suits, in which, if a defendant has any circumstances to offer in his defence, he must do so by way of defensive allegation.

Allege (al-lej'), v.t. pret. & pp. alleged; ppr. alleging. [Fr. alléguer, to allege; L. allegare, to depute, to allege—ad, and legare, to depute, to announce.] 1. To pronounce with positiveness; to declare; to affirm; to assert; as, to allege a fact.—2. To produce as an argument, plea, or excuse; to cite or quote; as, to allege the authority of a judge.—SYN. To bring forward, adduce, advance, assign, produce, cite, quote, declare, affirm, assert.

Allege,† Allegge† (al-leg'), v.t. [See ALLAY.] To alleviate; to lighten; to mitigate; to allay.

Allegeable (al-lej'a-bl), a. Capable of being alleged or affirmed.

Allegeas, Allegias (al-lē'jē-as, al-lē'ji-as), n. A stuff manufactured in the East Indies, of two kinds, one of cotton, the other of various plants, which are spun like flax.

Allegement† (al-lej'ment), n. Allegation.

Allegiance (al-lē'jans), n. [O.Fr., from L. alligo—ad, and ligo, to bind. See LIEGE and LEAGUE.] The tie or obligation of a subject to his sovereign or government; the duty of fidelity to a king, government, or state. Every native or citizen owes allegiance to the government under which he is born. This is called natural or implied allegiance, which arises from the connection of a person with the society in which he is born, and is independent of any express promise. Express allegiance is that obligation which proceeds from an express promise or oath of fidelity. Local or temporary allegiance is due from an alien to the government or state in which he resides.

> The bond of allegiance is mutual and reciprocal; for while the subject is bound to obey, the ruler is bound to protect. Quart. Rev.

Allegiant† (al-lē'ji-ant), a. Loyal.

> For your great graces . . . I > Can nothing render but allegiant thanks. Shak.

Allegoric, Allegorical (al-lē-gor'ik, al-lē-gor'ik-al), a. Pertaining to allegory; in the manner of allegory; figurative; describing by resemblances.—Allegorical pictures, pictures representing allegorical subjects.—Allegorical interpretation, the drawing of a spiritual or figurative meaning from literal matter; thus St. Paul gives an allegorical interpretation of the history of free-born Isaac and slave-born Ishmael.

Allegorically (al-lē-gor'ik-al-li), adv. In an allegorical or figurative manner; by way of allegory.

Allegoricalness (al-lē-gor'ik-al-nes), n. The quality of being allegorical.

Allegorist (al'lē-go-rist), n. One who allegorizes; a writer of allegory.

Allegorize (al'lē-go-rīz), v.t. pret. & pp. allegorized; ppr. allegorizing. 1. To turn into allegory; to narrate in allegory; to treat allegorically; as, to allegorize the history of a people.—2. To understand in an allegorical sense; as, when a passage in an author may be understood either literally or figuratively, he who gives it a figurative sense allegorizes it.

> An alchemist shall . . . allegorize the scripture itself, and the sacred mysteries thereof, into the philosopher's stone. Locke.

Allegorize (al'lē-go-rīz), v.i. To use allegory; as, a man may allegorize to please his fancy. 'He allegorizeth upon the sacrifices.' Fulke.

Allegorizer (al'lē-go-rīz-ér), n. One who allegorizes, or turns things into allegory.

Allegory (al'lē-go-ri), n. [Gr. allēgoria—allos, other, and agoreuō, to speak, from agora, a forum, an oration.] 1. A figurative sentence or discourse, in which the principal subject is described by another subject resembling it in its properties and circumstances. The principal subject is thus kept out of view, and we are left to collect the intentions of the writer or speaker by the resemblance of the secondary to the primary subject.

> This word nymphia meant nothing else but, by allegory, the vegetative humour or moisture that quickeneth and giveth life to trees and flowers.
> Peacham.

2. In painting and sculp. a figurative representation in which something else is intended than what is exhibited in the representation. It may be of three kinds: physical, moral, or historical.—Simile, Metaphor, Allegory, Parable. See under SIMILE.

Allegory† (al'lē-go-ri), v.i. To employ allegory; to allegorize.

> I am not ignorant that some do allegory on this place. Whitgift.

Allegretto (äl-lē-gret'tō). [From allegro.] In music, a movement or time quicker than andante, but not so quick as allegro.

Allegro (äl-lā'grō). [It., merry, cheerful.] In music, a word denoting a brisk movement; a sprightly part or strain; the quickest except presto.

Alleluia, Alleluiah (al-lē-lū'ya), n. [Heb. halelū-yāh, praise to Jah—halal, to praise, and Yāh, contracted for Yahweh, Jehovah.] 1. Praise Jehovah: a word used to denote pious joy and exultation, chiefly in hymns and anthems.—2. A song or ascription of praise to God; as, loud allelwiahs.—3. A former name for Oxalis Acetosella, the common wood-sorrel, because it is plentiful about the high religious festival of Easter.

Allemande (al-lē-mänd'), n. 1. A slow air in duple time; or grave, solemn music, with a slow movement.—2. A moderately quick dance, written in two-fourth time.—3. A figure in dancing.

Allemannic (al-lē-man'ik), a. Belonging to the Alemanni, or ancient Germans. See ALEMANNIC.

Allenarly (äl-len'ar-li), adv. [The recognized legal form of Sc. alanerlie, only, which is used both as an adverb and an adjective; from alane, alone. See ALONE.] Only; merely: a technical word used in Scotch conveyancing; thus, where lands are conveyed to a father, 'for his liferent use allenarly,' the force of the expression is, that the father's right is restricted to a mere liferent, or at best to a fiduciary fee, even in circumstances where, but for the word allenarly, the father would have been unlimited fiar.

Aller, a. See ALDER.

Allerion (al-lē'ri-on), n. In her. an eagle without beak or feet.

Allerion.

Allette (al-let'), n. Same as Alette.

Alleviate (al-lē'vi-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. alleviated; ppr. alleviating. [L. L. alleviare, alleviatus, L. allevare, allevatus—ad, to, and levo, to make light, from levis, light.] 1. To make light, in a figurative sense; to remove in part; to lessen, mitigate, or make easier to be endured; as, to alleviate sorrow, pain, care, punishment, a burden, &c.: opposed to aggravate.—2. To make less by representation; to lessen the magnitude or criminality of; to extenuate: applied to moral conduct; as, to alleviate an offence. 'He alleviates his fault by an excuse.' Johnson. [Rare.] —Alleviate, Mitigate, Assuage, Alleviate, to take weight off from, to lighten; mitigate, to make mild, to render less painful or severe; assuage, to appease, to pacify, to calm down: used of things in a state of violent unrest.—SYN. To lessen, diminish, soften, mitigate, assuage, abate, relieve, allay.

Alleviation (al-lē'vi-ā'shon), n. 1. The act of alleviating: (a) the act of removing in part, lessening, mitigating, or making easier to be endured. (b) The act of making less by representation; extenuation. 'Alleviations of faults.' South. — 2. That which lessens, mitigates, or makes more tolerable; as, the sympathy of a friend is an alleviation of grief.

I have not wanted such alleviations of life as friendship could supply. Johnson.

Alleviative (al-lē'vi-āt-iv), n. That which alleviates or mitigates. 'Some cheering alleviative.' Corah's Doom.

Alleviator (al-lē'vi-āt-ėr), n. He who or that which alleviates.

Alley (al'li), n. [Fr. allée, a passage, from aller, to go; O.Fr. aler, aner, Merovingian L. anare, to arrive, a softened form of L. adnare, to arrive, properly by sea, but also by land—ad, to, and nare, to swim. For change of L. n into Fr. l compare orphelin from orphaninus, Boulogne from Bononia.] A passage; especially, a narrow passage; as, (a) an aisle, or any part of a church left open for access to another part. (b) An inclosed walk in a garden. 'Yonder alleys green.' Milton. (c) A narrow passage or way in a town, as distinct from a public street. (d) In persp. that which, in order to have a greater appearance of length, is made wider at the entrance than at the termination.

Alley (al'li), n. [Said to be contracted from alabaster, from which it was formerly made.] A choice taw or large marble. Dickens.—Alley-tor (for alley-taw), an alley; a marble.

After inquiring whether he had won any alley-tors or commoneys lately, he made use of this expression. Dickens.

All-fools'-day (ąl'fölz-dā), n. The first day of April.

All-fours (ąl-fōrz'), n. [From all and four.] A game at cards, which derives its name from the four chances of which it consists, for each of which a point is scored. These chances are high, or the ace of trumps, or next best trump out; low, or the deuce of trumps, or next lowest trump out; jack, or the knave of trumps; game, the majority of pips collected from the tricks taken by the respective players. The player who has all these is said to have all-fours.—On all-fours, on four legs, or on two legs and two arms or hands; hence, even or evenly; consistent or consistently; parallel; square.

This example is on all-fours with the other. Macaulay.

All-good (ąl-gud'), n. The old English name for the plant Good Henry, or English mercury (Chenopodium bonus-Henricus).

All-hail (ąl-hāl'), exclam. and n. [All, and hail, A. Sax. hœl, health.] All health: a phrase of salutation, expressing a wish of all health or safety to the persons addressed.

Alligation (al-li-gā'shon), n. [From alligate.] 1. The act of tying together; the state of being tied. [Rare.]—2. A rule of arithmetic, chiefly found in the older books, relating to the solution of questions concerning the compounding or mixing together of different ingredients, or ingredients of different qualities or values. Thus if a quantity of sugar worth 8*d.* the lb. and another quantity worth 10*d.* are mixed, the question to be solved by alligation is, what is the value of the mixture by the pound?

Alligator (al'li-gā-tėr), n. [In Ben Jonson alligarta, a corruption of Sp. el lagarto, lit. the lizard—el, the, and Sp. and Pg. lagarto, a lizard; L. lacertus, lacerta, whence E. lizard. The Spanish name is lagarto de Indias or cayman.] A genus of saurian reptiles, of the family Crocodilidæ, sub-family Alligatoridæ. The alligators differ from the true crocodiles in having a shorter and flatter head, in having cavities or pits in the upper jaw, into which the long canine teeth of the under jaw fit, and in having the feet much less webbed. Their habits are less perfectly aquatic. They frequent swamps and marshes, and may be seen basking on the dry ground during the day in the heat of the sun. They are most active during the night, when they make a loud bellowing. The largest of these animals grow to the length of 17 or 18 feet. They live on fish, and sometimes catch hogs on the shore, or dogs which are swimming. In winter they burrow in the mud of swamps and marshes, lying torpid till spring. The female lays a great number of eggs, which are deposited in the sand, and left to be hatched by the heat of the sun. The most fierce and dangerous species is that found in the southern parts of the United States, as far up the Mississippi as the Red River (A. Lucius), having the snout a little turned up, resembling that of the pike. The alligators of South America are there very often called Caymans, and some of them bear the name of Jacaré, particularly A. sclerops, called also the Spectacled Cayman, from the prominent bony rim surrounding the orbit of each eye. The alligators are distributed over tropical America, but are not known to exist in any other part of the world. Among the fossils of the south of England, however, are remains of a true alligator (A. Hantoniensis) in the Eocene beds of the Hampshire basin.

Alligator-apple (al'li-gā-tėr-ap-l), n. The fruit of Anona palustris, a West Indian tree.

Alligatoridæ (al'li-ga-tor''i-dē), n. pl. See ALLIGATOR.

Alligator-pear (al'li-gā-tėr-pār), n. A West Indian fruit resembling a pear in shape. Called also Avocado-pear. See AVOCADO.

Alligator-tortoise (al'li-gā-tėr-tor'tois), n. A species of chelonian reptile (Chelydra serpentina), family Emydæ, with long tail and limbs, which cannot be entirely drawn within its bucklers. The alligator-tortoise is a native of the lakes, rivers, and morasses of Carolina, where it is very destructive to fish and water-fowl.

Alignment (al-līn'ment), n. Same as Alignment.

All-in-all. A phrase used both as a noun and as an adverb. (a) As a noun, (1) everything to a person; all that he desires.

Her good Philip was her all-in-all. Tennyson.

(2) Everything in all respects; as a whole.

Take him for all-in-all, I shall not look upon his like again. Shak.

(b) As an adverb, altogether.

Trust me not at all or all-in-all. Tennyson.

Allision (al-li'zhon), n. [L. allisio, allisionis, from allido, to dash or strike against—ad, and lædo, læsum, to hurt by striking.] A striking against. 'Islands . . . severed from it (the continent) by the boisterous allision of the sea.' Woodward.

Alliteration (al-lit-ėr-ā'shon), n. [Al for L. ad, to, and litera, a letter.] The repetition of the same letter at the beginning of two or more words immediately succeeding each other, or at short intervals; as, many men many minds; death defies the doctor. 'Apt alliteration's artful aid.' Churchill. 'Puffs, powders, patches, bibles, billet-doux.' Pope. In the ancient German and Scandinavian and in early English poetry alliteration took the place of terminal rhymes, the alliterative syllables being made to recur with a certain regularity in the same position in successive verses. In the vision of William concerning Piers the Plowman, for instance, it is regularly employed as in the following lines:—

Hire *r*obe was ful *r*iche· of *r*ed scarlet engreyned,
With *r*ibanes of *r*ed gold· and of *r*iche stones;
Hire *a*rraye me *r*avysshed· such *r*ichesse saw I nevere;
I had *w*ondre *w*hat she *w*as· and *w*has *w*yf she were.

Alliterative (al-lit'ėr-āt-iv), a. Pertaining to or consisting in alliteration; characterized by alliteration. 'Their aliliterative versification, which consisted in using an aggregate of words beginning with the same letter.' T. Warton.

Alliterativeness (al-lit'ėr-āt-iv-nes), n. Quality of being alliterative.

Alliterator (al-lit'ėr-āt-ėr), n. One who uses alliteration.

The alliterator must be as busily employed to introduce his favourite vowel or consonant as the Greek poet to shut out the letter he had proscribed. Connoisseur.

Allium (al'li-um), n. [L. allium, alium, garlic.] A genus of bulbous plants, nat. order Liliaceæ, remarkable for their pungent odour, having grassy or fistular leaves, and star-shaped, six-parted, hexandrous flowers growing in an umbel at the top of the scape. To this genus belong the onion, leek, garlic, chive, and shallot. They contain free phosphoric acid and sulphuretted oil.

Allness (al'nes), n. Totality; entirety; completeness. 'The allness of God, including his absolute spirituality, supremacy, and eternity.' Rich. Turnbull.

Allocate (al'lō-kāt), v.t. pret. & pp. allocated; ppr. allocating. [L. ad, to, and loco, locatum, to place, from locus, a place.] To assign or allot; to set apart for a particular purpose; to distribute; as, to allocate shares in a public company.

The court is empowered to seize upon, and allocate, for the maintenance of such child, any sum not exceeding a third of the whole fortune. Burke.

Allot (al-lot'), v.t. pret. & pp. allotted; ppr. allotting. [O.Fr. allotir, alloter, to divide, part—al for ad, and lotir, to cast lots for, to apportion, from lot, a share, which itself is a Teutonic word = A.Sax. hlot. See LOT.] To divide or distribute as by lot; to distribute or parcel out in parts or portions; to grant; to assign; to appoint; to set apart; to destine.

Now, of what has been produced, a part only is allotted to the support of productive labour; and there will not, and cannot, be more of that labour than the portion so allotted (which is the capital of the country) can feed and provide with materials and instruments of production. J. S. Mill.

Allotable (al-lot'a-bl), a. Capable of being allotted.

Allotment (al-lot'ment), n. 1. The act of allotting; distribution as by lot.—2. That which is allotted; a share, part, or portion granted or distributed; that which is assigned by lot or by the act of God. 'The allotments of God and nature.' L'Estrange. 3. A place or piece of ground appropriated. 'A vineyard and an allotment for olives.' Broome.—Allotment of goods, in com. the dividing a ship's cargo into several parts, which are to be purchased by several persons, each person's share being assigned by lot.—Allotment of land, such portions of ground as are granted to claimants on the division and inclosure of commons and waste lands.—Allotment-note, a note signed by a seaman authorizing the periodical payment of a portion of his wages to another party, as to his wife.—Allotment system, the practice of dividing land into small portions for cultivation by agricultural labourers and other cottagers after they have performed their ordinary day's work.

Allotropic (al-lō-trop'ik), a. In chem. of or pertaining to allotropy.

Allotropy, Allotropism (al-lot'ro-pi, al-lot'ro-pizm), n. [Gr. allos, another, and tropos, condition.] In chem. the capability or characteristic exhibited by some elements of existing in more than one form, and with different characteristics. Carbon is a good example, as it crystallizes perfectly in the diamond, imperfectly in graphite, and is amorphous, yet quite distinct, in anthracite, coal, and charcoal.

Allottee (al'lot'tē), n. One to whom anything is allotted, as the holder of an allotment-note and the like.

The allotment of gardens, which yield a partial support to the allottee, is another means of cheap labour. Mayhew.

Allottery† (al-lot'tėr-i), n. Allotment; what is allotted or assigned to use.

Give me the poor allottery my father left me by testament. Shak.

All-over, All-overish (al-ō'vėr, al-ō'vėr-ish), a. Giving a general sense of bodily uneasiness or slight indisposition; as, an all-overish sort of feeling. [Vulgar.]

Allow (al-lou'), v.t. [Two words are in this confounded under one form, the E. allow being based partly on Fr. allouer, to allow, to grant, to settle, from L.L. allocare—ad, to, and locare (from locus, a place), to place or assign, to let or lease; and partly on an obs. Fr. allouer, to approve or praise, from L. ad, and laudare, to praise, from laus, laudis, praise. The French has still the two simple verbs louer, to let or hire, from L. locare, and louer, to praise or commend, from L. laudare.] 1. To grant, give, or yield; to assign; to afford; as, to allow a free passage.

He was allowed about three hundred pounds a year. Macaulay.

There is no slander in an allowed fool. Shak.

—Allow, Permit, Suffer, Tolerate. Allow and permit are often used synonymously; but allow rather implies a formal sanction; permit, that we merely do not hinder; suffer is still more passive than permit, and may imply that we do not prevent something, though we feel it to be disagreeable, or know it to be wrong; tolerate is always used in the sense of permitting or bearing something unpleasant.

Allow (al-lou'), v.i. 1. To concede; to make abatement, concession, or provision. 'Allowing still for the different ways of making it.' Addison.—2.† To connive. 'Her allowing husband.' Shak.—To allow of, to permit; to admit. 'Of this allow.' Shak. 'Ere I will allow of thy wits.' Shak.

Allowable (al-lou'a-bl), a. Proper to be or capable of being allowed or permitted as lawful, true, or proper; not forbidden; not unlawful or improper; permissible; as, a certain degree of freedom is allowable among friends.

In actions of this sort, the light of nature alone may discover that which is in the sight of God allowable. Hooker.

Allowableness (al-lou'a-bl-nes), n. The quality of being allowable; exemption from prohibition or impropriety; lawfulness.

Lots, as to their nature, use, and allowableness, in matters of recreation, are indeed impugned by some. South.

Allowably (al-lou'a-bli), adv. In an allowable manner; with propriety.

Allowance (al-lou'ans), n. 1. Permission; license; sanction; as, my allowance of this course will depend on circumstances.—2. Assent to a fact or state of things; admission; a granting.—3.† Approval; approbation.

Humbly craving . . . it may receive approbation and patronage from so learned and judicious a Prince as your Highness is, whose allowance and acceptance of our labours shall more honour and encourage us than all the calumniations and hard interpretations of other men shall dismay us. Epistle Dedicatory to the Bible.

4. A stated quantity, as of money, or of food or drink, allowed for maintenance; a settled rate; quantity allowed or granted.

Though he drew a large allowance under pretence of keeping a public table, he never asked a minister to dinner. Macaulay.

5. Charitable overlooking of faults; relaxation of severity in censure; as, to make an allowance for the inexperience of youth.—6.† Established character; reputation. 'His pilot of very expert and approved allowance.' Shak.—7. In com. a deduction or abatement from the gross weight of goods, according to the customs of particular countries and ports, the chief of which is called tare.

Allowance (al-lou'ans), v.t. To put upon allowance; to restrain or limit to a certain amount of money or stated quantity of provisions or drink; as, distress compelled the captain of the ship to allowance his crew.

Allowedly (al-lou'ed-li), adv. Admittedly.

Lord Lyttleton is allowedly the author of these dialogues. Shenstone.

Allower (al-lou'ér), n. One who allows, permits, grants, or authorizes.

Alloxan (al-loks'an), n. ($C_4H_2N_2O_4$.) One of the products of the decomposition of uric acid by nitric acid. When treated with alkalies it produces alloxanic acid, the salts of which are termed alloxanates.

Alloxanate (al-loks'an-āt), n. A salt formed by the union of alloxanic acid and a base.

Alloxanic (al-loks-an'ik), a. Pertaining to or produced by alloxan; as, alloxanic acid.

Alloxantin (al-loks-an'tin), n. ($C_8H_4N_4O_7 + 3\,H_2O$.) A white crystalline substance obtained when alloxan is brought into contact with zinc and hydrochloric acid, with chloride of zinc, or sulphuretted hydrogen. Oxidizing agents reconvert this substance into alloxan. Called also Uroxin.

Alloy (al-loi'), n. [Fr. aloi, legal standard of coin—à, according to, and loi, law, from L. lex, legis, law. In O.Fr. loi had the meaning of standard alloy for coin, as Sp. ley has still.] 1. A baser metal mixed with a finer; the cheapest metal of a mixture.—2. A mixture of different metals; any metallic compound. Alloys of metallic substances are either natural or artificial; but those which are artificial are by far the most important. By far the greater number of the metals may be alloyed together in varying proportions. Some of the alloys, however, form definite chemical compounds. When mercury is one of the component parts the alloy is called an amalgam.—3. Fig. evil mixed with good; as, no happiness is without alloy.

Alloy (al-loi'), v.t. 1. To reduce the purity of a metal by mixing with it a portion of one less valuable; as, to alloy gold with silver, or silver with copper.—2. To reduce, abate, or impair by mixture; as, to alloy pleasure with misfortunes.

Alloyage (al-loi'āj), n. 1. The act of alloying metals, or the mixture of a baser metal with a finer, to reduce its purity; the act of mixing metals.—2. A mixture of different metals; an alloy.

All-saints'-day (ạl'sānts-dā), n. All-Hallowmas or Hallowmas, a festival of the Christian Church, first instituted by Pope Gregory IV., in 835, and dedicated to all the saints in general, on account of the impossibility of allotting a day to each saint. It is celebrated on the 1st November, this day being chosen because it was one of the four great heathen festivals of the northern nations, the policy of the early Church being, not so much directly to oppose paganism in many respects, as to supplant it by giving a Christian character to its observances.

All-seed (ạl'sēd), n. A name applied to two very different British plants, the one Polycarpon tetraphyllum, a small plant found in the south-west of England, the other Chenopodium polyspermum, found in waste places.

All-sorts (ạl'sorts), n. A term used in taverns or beer-shops to denote a beverage composed of left drops of liquor of various descriptions mixed together.—All sorts of, a low term used in the Southern States of America for acute, capital, excellent; as, all sorts of a fellow.

All-souls'-day (ạl'sōlz-dā), n. The 2d November, a festival in the Roman Catholic Church, when prayers are publicly offered up for the release of souls from purgatory.

All-spice (ạl'spīs), n. The fruit of Eugenia Pimenta, a tree of the West Indies; a spice of a mildly pungent taste, and agreeably aromatic. Its odour and flavour are supposed to combine those of cinnamon, cloves, and nutmeg, hence the name. Called also Jamaica Pepper.

Allude (al-lūd'), v.i. [L. alludo, to smile upon or make sport with—ad, and ludo, to play.] To refer to something not directly mentioned; to have reference; to hint at by remote suggestions.

These speeches . . . do seem to allude unto such ministerial garments as were then in use. Hooker.

—Advert, Allude, Refer. See under ADVERT.

SYN. To hint, refer, suggest, intimate, glance at, advert to.

Alludet (al-lūd'), v.t. To compare.

To free myselfe from the imputation of partiality, I'le at last allude her to a waterman. John Taylor.

Allumée (al-lūm-ē' or al-lụm-ā). In her. applied to the eyes of a bear or other beast, when they are drawn red and sparkling.

Allumette (al-lụ-met), n. [Fr.] A match for lighting candles, lamps, &c.

Alluminatet (al-lū'min-āt), v.t. To colour; to embellish.

Alluminort (al-lū'min-or), n. [Fr. enlumineur. See LIMN.] One who anciently illuminated manuscripts; an illuminator.

Allurancet (al-lūr'ans), n. Allurement.

Allure (al-lūr'), v.t. pret. & pp. allured; ppr. alluring. [Prefix al for ad, to, and lure, Fr. leurrer, to decoy. See LURE.] To tempt by the offer of some good, real or apparent; to invite by something flattering or acceptable; to draw or try to draw by some proposed pleasure or advantage; as, rewards allure men to brave danger. 'Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way.' Goldsmith.—Allure, Entice, Decoy. Allure, to attract by a lure or bait, to lead aside or onwards by practising upon one's love of pleasure or hope of gain; entice, to seduce by flattering promises or fair speech, by stirring up feelings within us; decoy, to lead into a snare by artifice or by false appearances; to deceitfully lead into danger.—SYN. To attract, entice, tempt, decoy, seduce.

Allure† (al-lūr'), n. Something set up to entice; a lure. Sir J. Hayward.

Allurement (al-lūr'ment), n. The act of alluring, or that which allures; any real or apparent good held forth or operating as a motive to action; temptation; enticement; as, the allurements of pleasure or of honour.

Adam, by his wife's allurement, fell. Milton.

Allurer (al-lūr'ér), n. One who, or that which, allures.

Money, the sweet allurer of our hopes,
Ebbs out in oceans, and comes in by drops.
Dryden.

Alluring (al-lūr'ing), a. Inviting; having the quality of attracting or tempting. 'Each flatt'ring hope, and each alluring joy.' Lord Lyttleton.

Alluringly (al-lūr'ing-li), adv. In an alluring manner; enticingly.

Alluringness (al-lūr'ing-nes), n. The quality of alluring or tempting by the prospect of some advantage or pleasure.

Allusion (al-lū'zhon), n. [L. allusio. See ALLUDE.] A reference to something not explicitly mentioned; an indirect or incidental suggestion of something supposed to be known; a reference by a speaker to some striking incident or passage which serves to illustrate the subject on hand; a hint; as, a classical allusion.

The great art of a writer shows itself in the choice of pleasing allusions. Addison.

Allusive (al-lū'siv), a. Having reference to something not fully expressed; containing allusions. 'An unsatisfactory series of hasty and allusive sketches.' Sir E. Creasy.

Allusively (al-lū'siv-li), adv. In an allusive manner; by way of allusion; by implication, remote suggestion, or insinuation. Hammond.

Allusiveness (al-lū'siv-nes), n. The quality of being allusive. 'The multifarious allusiveness of the prophetical style.' Dr. H. More.

Allusory (al-lū'so-ri), a. Allusive. 'Expressions . . . figurative and allusory.' Warburton.

Alluvial (al-lū'vi-al), a. [See ALLUVIUM.] Pertaining to or having the character of alluvium; deposited or thrown up by the action of waves or currents of water; as, alluvial deposits; alluvial soil.—Alluvial formations, in geol. recent deposits in valleys or in plains of the detritus of the neighbouring mountains, brought down chiefly by the action of water. Most of our river-plains—the haughs, carses, and straths of Scotland, and the dales, holms, and fens of England—are alluvial, having been deposited from the waters either of a river, a lake, or an arm of the sea. See ALLUVIUM.

Alluvion, Alluvio (al-lū'vi-on, al-lū'vi-ō), n. The washing up of sand or earth so as to form new soil; the soil thus formed; alluvium: now more especially used as a legal term, and signifying an increase of land on a shore or bank of a river by the action of water, as by a current or by waves. If the addition has been gradual and imperceptible the owner of the land thus augmented has a right to the alluvial earth; but if the addition has been sudden and considerable, by the law of England the alluvion is the property of the crown, while by the law of Scotland it remains the property of the person of whose lands it originally formed part.

Alluvious (al-lū'vi-us), a. The same as Alluvial. [Rare.]

Alluvium (al-lū'vi-um), n. [L. alluvio, alluvionis, an inundation, alluvius, alluvial—ad, to, and luo = Gr. louō, L. lavo, to wash. Stem seen also in deluge, lave, lotion, dilute, &c.] In geol. and phys. geog. a deposit collected by means of the action of water, such as are found in valleys and plains, consisting of gravel, loam, clay, or other earths washed down from the mountains or high grounds. Great alterations in the limits of countries are produced by alluvial deposits along the sea-shores, the banks of rivers or at their mouths, forming deltas, valley-bottoms (straths), &c.

Ally (al-lī'), v.t. pret. & pp. allied; ppr. allying. [Fr. allier, to join, to unite; reciprocal verb s'allier, to confederate or become allied, —al for ad, to, and lier, to tie or unite; L. ligo, to bind.] 1. To unite by marriage, treaty, league, or confederacy; to connect by formal agreement: generally used in passive or with reflexive pronouns.—2. To bind together; to connect, as by similitude, resemblance, or friendship.

Wants, frailties, passions, closer still ally
The common interests, or endear the tie. Pope.

Ally (al-lī'), v.i. To be closely united.

Ally (al-lī'), n. A prince or state united by treaty or league; a confederate; one related by marriage or other tie: seldom applied now to individuals, except to princes in their public capacity.

The foe, the victim, and the fond ally
That fights for all, but ever fights in vain. Byron.

You must talk much of your kindred and allies (acquaintance). B. Jonson.

Allyl (al'lil), n. (C_3H_5.) A radicle which cannot exist in the free state. At the moment of its liberation two molecules combine together to form diallyl ($2\,C_3H_5$ or C_6H_{10}). Diallyl is a pungent ethereal liquid. The hydrate of this substance is called allyl alcohol (C_3H_6O).

Allylamine (al-lil'a-min), n. A mobile liquid having a sharp burning taste, produced by the action of potash on allyl cyanate. It may be regarded as ammonia in which one hydrogen atom is replaced by allyl ($NH_2C_3H_5$).

Allylene (al'lil-ēn), n. A gaseous hydrocarbon (C_3H_4), standing in the same relation to allyl (C_3H_5) as ethylene (C_2H_4) to ethyl (C_2H_5).

Almacantar (al-ma-kan'tär), n. See ALMUCANTAR.

Almadie, Almady (al'ma-di), n. [Fr. almadie; Sp. almadia, from Ar. al-madiyat, a raft.] A boat used in India, about 80 feet long and 6 or 7 broad, shaped like a shuttle; also, a small African canoe, made of the bark of trees. Some of the larger square-sterned negro boats are also thus designated.

Almagest (al'ma-jest), n. [A hybrid word composed of Ar. al, the, and Gr. megistē (biblos), greatest book.] A book or collection of problems in astronomy and geometry, drawn up by Ptolemy, and so named by the Arabs because it was reckoned the greatest and most complete on the subjects. The same title has been given to other works of a like kind.

Almagra (al-mā'gra), n. [Sp., from Ar. almaghrat, red clay or earth.] A fine deep red ochre, with an admixture of purple, used in India for staining the person. Sometimes used as a paint, and for polishing silver and glass, under the name of Indian red.

Almain-rivet. See ALMAYNE-RIVET.

Alma Mater (al'ma mā'tér). [L., benign mother, fostering mother.] An epithet first given to the earth as the mother of all; then applied by students to the university where they have been trained.

Alman (al'man), n. Same as Almond-furnace.

Almanac, Almanack (ạl'ma-nak), n. [Fr. almanach, It. almanacco, Sp. almanaque, Ar. al-manākh, probably from a root meaning to reckon; Heb. manah.] A table, book, or publication of some kind, generally annual, comprising a calendar of days, weeks, and months, with the times of the rising of the sun and moon, changes of the moon, eclipses, hours of full tide, stated festivals of churches, stated terms of courts, &c., for a certain year or years. Almanacs owed their origin to astrology, and existed in the East and in Egypt in remote ages. The agricultural, political, and statistical information which is usually contained in popular almanacs, though as valuable a part of the work as any, is comparatively of modern date.—Nautical almanac, an almanac published annually by the British government, under the superintendence of the astronomer-royal, and always several years in advance. It contains, among other things, the distances of the moon from the sun and fixed stars for every three hours of apparent time, adapted to the meridian of Greenwich; by comparing which with the distances carefully observed at sea, the mariner may readily infer his longitude to a degree of exactness that is found sufficient for most nautical purposes.

Almandine (al'man-dīn), n. [Fr. almandine, L.L. alamandina, alavandina, alabandina, a gem brought from Alabanda, a city in Asia Minor.] Precious or noble garnet, a beautiful mineral of a red colour, of various shades, sometimes tinged with yellow or blue. It is commonly translucent, sometimes transparent. It occurs crystallized in the rhombic dodecahedron. See GARNET.

Almandres,† n. An almond-tree. Chaucer.

Alman-rivet (al'man-riv-et), n. Same as Almayne-rivet.

Almayne-rivet, Almain-rivet (al-mān'-riv'et), n. [Fr. allemayne, German.] In milit. antiq. one of a series of rivets or short pieces of metal sliding in slot-holes formed in the overlapping plates of armour, so that the plates would yield to the motions of the human body; first used by the Germans about 1450. The term Almayne-rivets came afterwards to be applied to suits of armour constructed in this manner.

Alme, Almeh (al'mē), n. The name given in some parts of the East, and especially in Egypt, to girls whose occupation is to amuse company with singing and dancing, or to sing dirges at funerals. 'The almehs lift their arms in dance.' Bayard Taylor.

Almehrab, Almihrab (al-mā'rāb, al-mē'-rāb), n. [Ar. al, the, and mihrab, the praying-place in a mosque.] Same as Mihrab (which see).

Almena (al-mē'na), n. A weight of 2 lbs., used to weigh saffron in several parts of Asia.

Almery (al'mėr-i), n. Same as Almonry or Ambry.

Almesse,† n. [See ALMS.] Alms.

Almicantarath (al-mi-kan'tär-ath), n. Same as Almucantar.

Almightily (al-mī'ti-li), adv. In an almighty manner; with almighty power. H. Taylor. [Rare.]

Almightiness (al-mī'ti-nes), n. The quality of being almighty; omnipotence; infinite or boundless power. 'The force of his almightiness.' Jer. Taylor.

Almighty (al-mī'ti), a. [All and mighty. See MIGHT.] 1. Possessing all power; omnipotent; being of unlimited might; being of boundless sufficiency.—2. Great; extreme.

> Poor Aroar can not live, and can not die,—so that he is in an almighty fix. De Quincey.

—Almighty dollar, a phrase forcibly expressive of the power of money, first used by Washington Irving in a sketch of a 'Creole Village' published in 1837. The idea of this phrase, however, is much older than Irving's time, Ben Jonson's 'Epistle to Elizabeth, Countess of Rutland,' commencing thus:—

> Whilst that for which all virtue now is sold,
> And almost every vice, almighty gold.

—The Almighty, the omnipotent God. 'By the Almighty, who shall bless thee.' Gen. xlix. 25.

Almond (ä'mund), n. [Fr. amande, Pr. amandola, It. amandola, corrupted from L. amygdala, Gr. amygdalē, an almond. In G. it appears as mandel, in D. as amandel.] 1. The seed or kernel of Amygdalus communis, or almond-tree, probably a native of Barbary. The fruit is a drupe, ovoid, and with downy outer surface; the fleshy covering is tough and fibrous; it covers the compressed wrinkled stone inclosing the seed or almond within it. There are two varieties, one sweet and the other bitter; both are produced from A. communis, though from different varieties. The chief kinds of sweet almonds are the Valentian, Jordan, and Malaga. They contain a bland fixed oil, consisting chiefly of olein. Bitter almonds come from Magadore, and besides a fixed oil they contain an azotized substance called emulsin, and also a bitter crystalline substance called amygdalin, which, acting on the emulsin, produces prussic acid; hence the aroma of bitter almonds when mixed with water. Almond-oil is expressed from the kernels. The name almond, with a qualifying word prefixed, is also given to the seeds of other species of plants; thus, Java almonds are the kernels of Canarium commune.—2. In lapidary work, a piece of rock-crystal used in adorning branch candlesticks: so called from its resemblance to the almond.—Almond of the throat, one of the glands commonly known as tonsils.

Almond-cake (ä'mund-kāk), n. The cake left after expressing the oil from the almond. Its powder is used as soap in washing the hands.

Almond-furnace (ä'mund-fėr-nis), n. [Perhaps corrupted from Fr. allemand, German, and meaning therefore German furnace.] A furnace in which the slags of litharge, left in refining silver, are reduced to lead by being heated with charcoal, which, combining with the oxygen, forms carbonic acid gas, which escapes and leaves the metal pure.

Almondine (al'mun-dīn), n. Precious or noble garnet; almandine (which see).

> But I would throw to them back in mine,
> Turkis and agate and almondine. Tennyson.

Almond-oil (ä'mund-oil), n. A bland, fixed oil obtained from almonds by pressure, used in medicine as a demulcent in catarrhal affections.

Almond-paste (ä'mund-pāst), n. A cosmetic to soften the skin and prevent chaps, composed of bitter almonds, white of egg, rose-water, and rectified spirit.

Almond-tree (ä'mund-trē), n. A species of Amygdalus (A. communis); the tree which produces the almond. The leaves and flowers resemble those of the peach, but the fruit is longer and more compressed, the green coat is fibrous, thinner, and drier when ripe, and the shell is not so rugged. The almond-tree is only grown in this country for the sake of its beautiful vernal flowers, which appear before the leaves, as it seldom ripens its fruit even in the south of England, except in unusually hot summers, preceded by mild and uninterrupted springs.

Almond-willow (ä'mund-wil-lō), n. The Salix amygdalina, a British species of willow, the leaves of which resemble those of the almond-tree, being light green on both sides.

Almoner (al'mon-ėr), n. [O.Fr. almosnier, Fr. aumônier, L.L. almonarius, eleemosynarius, from Gr. eleēmosynē, really the same word as E. alms. See ALMS.] A dispenser of alms or charity; more especially an officer who directs or carries out the distribution of charitable doles in connection with religious communities, hospitals, or almshouses, or on behalf of some superior. In England there is a lord-almoner, or lord high-almoner, an ecclesiastical officer, generally a bishop, who formerly had the forfeiture of all deodands and the goods of self-murderers, which he had to distribute to the poor. He distributes twice a year the sovereign's bounty, which consists in giving a silver penny each to as many poor persons as the sovereign is years of age. There is also a sub-almoner, and a hereditary grand almoner. The office of the latter is now almost a sinecure.

Almonry (al'mon-ri), n. [L.L. almonarium, eleemosynarium. See ALMS. Corrupted into ambry, aumbry, or aumery. See AMBRY.] 1. The place where an almoner resides, or where alms are distributed.—2. A receptacle for articles; a closet; a cupboard; an ambry. See AMBRY.

Almory (al'mo-ri), n. Same as Almonry.

Almost (al'mōst), adv. [All and most. In Anglo-Saxon the two elements were written separately, thus: 'All most who were present' (Sax. Chron.). We now use a duplication, almost all who were present.] Nearly; well nigh; for the greatest part.

> Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.
> Acts xxvi. 28.

Almry† (äm'ri), n. Same as Almonry.

Alms (ämz), n. [A. Sax. almes, ælmesse, O.E. almesse, almes, almous, almose, &c., Sc. awmous, borrowed, like G. almosen, Icel. almusa, Fr. aumosne, aumône, from L. eleemosyna, alms, from Gr. eleēmosynē, pity, from eleeō, to pity. 'This English monosyllable alms has descended to us from the Greek and Latin word of six syllables, and it well exemplifies the remark of Horne Tooke that 'letters, like soldiers, are apt to desert and drop off in a long march.'' Worcester.] Anything given gratuitously to relieve the poor, as money, food, or clothing; a charitable dole; charity.

> When thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth. Mat. vi. 3.
> Enoch set himself,
> Scorning an alms, to work whereby to live.
> Tennyson.

—Tenure by free alms, in England, a tenure by which the possessor is bound to pray for the soul of the donor, whether dead or alive; frankalmoigne (which see). [This word (like riches) is strictly a singular, but its apparently plural form has caused it to be often regarded as grammatically plural.]

Alms-deed (ämz'dēd), n. An act of charity; a charitable gift. Acts ix. 36.

Alms-drink (ämz'dringk), n. The leavings of drink, such as might be given away in alms.

> 2d Serv. Lepidus is high-coloured.
> 1st Serv. They have made him drink alms-drink. Shak.

Alms-fee (ämz'fē), n. Alms-money.

> He (Edmund), toward the middle of the tenth century, strictly commands payment of tithe, . . . and alms-fee. Kemble.

Alms-folk (ämz'fōk), n. Persons supported by alms.

Alms-gate (ämz'gāt), n. The gate of religious or great houses, at which alms were distributed to the poor.

Almsgiver (ämz'giv-ėr), n. One who gives alms.

Almsgiving (ämz'giv-ing), n. The act of giving alms.

Alms-house (ämz'hous), n. A house appropriated for the use of the poor who are supported by the public or by a revenue derived from private endowment; a poor-house.

Alms-man (ämz'man), n. pl. Alms-men (ämz'men). 1. A person supported by charity or by public provision.

> Even bees, the little alms-men of spring bowers.
> Keats.

2. A charitable person. Becon. [Obsolete and rare.]

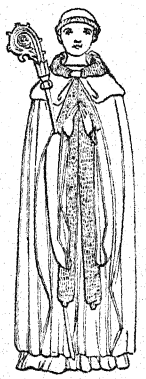
Almucantar,† Almucanter† (al-mū-kan'-tär, al-mū-kan'tėr), n. [Ar. almuqantarat, solar quadrant, clock—al, the, and muqantarāt, circles parallel to the horizon, from qantara, to bend. Mahn.] In astron. a small circle of the sphere parallel to the horizon; a circle or parallel of altitude. When two stars have the same almucantar they have the same altitude.—Almucantar staff, an instrument having an arc of 15°, formerly used to take observations of the sun about the time of its rising or setting, to find the amplitude and the variations of the compass.



Priest wearing the Almuce.—From a sepulchral brass.

Almuce, Aumuce (al'mūs, a'mūs), n. [O.Fr. almuce, aumuce, aumusse, Pr. almussa, Sp. almucio, a hybrid word composed of Ar. al, the, and the Teutonic word seen as G. mütze, a cap, D. mutse, Sc. mutch.] A furred hood having long ends hanging down the front of the dress, something like the stole; worn by the clergy from the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries for warmth when officiating in the church during inclement weather.

Almude (al-mūd'), n. [Pg. almude, Sp. almud, Ar. al-mudd, a dry measure; allied to Heb. mad, a measure.] A variable measure for liquids and grain in Spain and Portugal, ranging for liquids from 3½ to 5½ English gallons; for grain, from 3½ to 11 pints.

Almug, Algum (al'mug, al'gum), n. [Heb. almuggim, algummim, translated almug or algum trees.] In Scrip. a tree or wood of unknown species. Max Müller identifies the Hebrew word with the Sanskrit valguka, a Malabar name for sandal-wood.

Alnage (al'nāj), n. [Fr. aulnage, now softened into aunage, from O.Fr. alne, Fr. aune, from L. ulna, Gr. ōlenē, an arm, a cubit. See ELL.] A measuring by the ell.

Alnager, Alnagar (al'na-jėr, al'na-gär), n. A measurer by the ell; formerly in England a sworn officer, whose duty was to inspect and measure woollen cloth, and fix upon it a seal.

Alnath† (al'nath), n. The first star in the horns of Aries, whence the first mansion of the moon takes its name. Chaucer.

Alnight† (al'nīt), n. A cake of wax with the wick in the midst to burn all night. Bacon.

Alnus (al'nus), n. [L.] The alder, a genus of plants, nat. order Betulaceæ, inhabiting northern temperate regions, and living in a moist soil. A. glutinosa (the common alder) is a well-known tree, which grows in damp places or by the sides of rivers. It supplies excellent charcoal for the manufacture of gunpowder; the bark is valuable for tanning, and the young shoots for dyeing various colours when mixed with other ingredients. Its stems, when hollowed out, are used for water-pipes and underground purposes, and the veiny knots of the wood are cut into veneers by cabinet-makers. A. incana is the Turkey alder, which grows to a larger size than the common alder. A. cordifolia (the heart-leaved alder) is a native of Italy, and is one of the most interesting ornamental trees that have of late years been introduced into cultivation. There are several American species.

Alody (al'o-di), n. In law, same as Allodium.

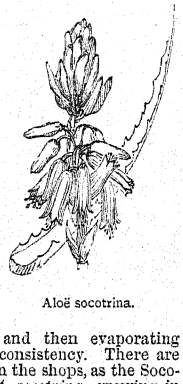
Aloe (al'ō), n. [Gr. aloē, Heb. ahālim, ahāloth, the bitter aloe.] 1. The common name of the plants of the genus Aloë, nat. order Liliaceæ. They are natives of warm climates, and especially abundant in the southern part of Africa. Among the Mohammedans the aloe is a symbolic plant, especially in Egypt; and every one who returns from a pilgrimage to Mecca hangs it over his street door, as a token that he has performed the journey. In Africa the leaves of some species of aloe are made into ropes, fishing-lines, bow-strings, and hammocks. Several species yield aloes, the well-known bitter purgative medicine. Many species are cultivated in Britain, growing easily on very dry soil. — American aloe. See AGAVE. 2. pl. as sing. A drug, the juice of species of aloe, obtained from the leaves, sometimes by cutting them across, when the resinous juice exudes and is evaporated into a firm consistence, sometimes by pressing the juice and mucilage out together, and in other cases by dissolving the juice out of the cut leaves by boiling and then evaporating down to a proper consistency. There are several kinds sold in the shops, as the Socotrine aloes, from A. socotrina, growing in Socotra, an isle near the mouth of the Red Sea; the hepatic or common Barbadoes aloes, from A. sinuata, of the West Indies; and the fetid or caballine aloes. Aloes is a stimulating stomachic purgative; when taken in small doses it is useful for people of a lax habit and sedentary life. The chemical principle contained in aloes is called aloïn (which see).



Aloë socotrina.

Aloes-wood (al'ōz-wōd), n. See AGALLOCHUM.

Aloetic, Aloetical (al-ō-et'ik, al-ō-et'ik-al), a. Pertaining to or obtained from the aloe or aloes; partaking of the qualities, or consisting chiefly, of aloes.

Aloetic (al-ō-et'ik), n. A medicine or preparation consisting chiefly of aloes.

Aloexylon, Aloexylum (al-ō-eks'i-lon, al-ō-eks'i-lum), n. [Gr. aloē, the aloe, and xylon, wood.] A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosæ. A. Agallochum, the only species, a tree 60 feet high, said to grow on the high mountains of Cochin-China, produces one of the two kinds of calambac, or agallochum, a fragrant wood and resinous perfume, highly prized in the East. The wood is used for inlaying in cabinet-work, and is highly valued, costing £30 per cwt. in Sumatra.

Aloft (a-loft'), adv. [Prefix a, and loft; Icel. á lopt. See LOFT.] 1. On high; in the air; high above the ground; as, the eagle soars aloft.

There's a sweet little cherub that sits up aloft
To keep watch for the life of poor Jack. Dibdin.

2. Naut. in the top; at the mast-head; or on the higher yards or rigging; hence, on the upper part, as of a building.

Aloft† (a-loft'), prep. On the top or surface of; above. 'Now I breathe again aloft the flood.' Shak.

Alogian (a-lō'ji-an), n. [Gr. a, neg., and logos, word.] One of a sect of ancient heretics, who denied Jesus Christ to be the Logos, and consequently rejected the Gospel of St. John.

Alogy† (al'o-ji), n. [L. alogia, from Gr. alogia, from alogos, unreasonable — a, priv., and logos, word, discourse, reason.] Unreasonableness; absurdity.

The error and alogy in this opinion is worse than in the last. Sir T. Browne.

Aloïn (al'o-in), n. ($C_{17}H_{18}O_7$.) A crystalline bitter principle got from aloes in pale yellow prismatic needles, grouped in stars.

Alomancy (al'o-man-si), n. [Gr. hals, salt, and manteia, divination.] Divination by salt.

Alonde,† adv. On land. Chaucer.

Alone (a-lōn'), a. or adv. [All and one. The all and one were formerly printed as separate words, thus—'The Lord is God al one.' Robt. of Gloucester. Gower has 'wher he made his mone, within a gardeine all him one.' G. allein, Dan. allene, D. alleen, alone, are all formed in the same way.] 1. Apart from another or others; single; solitary: applied to a person or thing; as, to remain alone; to walk alone.

It is not good that man should be alone. Gen. ii. 18.
And when they were alone, he expounded all things to his disciples. Mark iv. 34.

2. Only; to the exclusion of other persons or things; sole or solely; as, he alone remained (different from he remained alone); two men alone returned.

Man shall not live by bread alone. Luke iv. 4.

3.† Without a parallel; above all things; rare; par excellence.

Her worth makes other worthies nothing.
She is alone. Shak.
I am alone the villain of the earth. Shak.

[In second sense alone sometimes comes attributively before a noun. 'The alone merits of our Lord Jesus Christ.' John Wesley.

Even one alone verse sometimes makes a perfect poeme. Ben Jonson.]

—To let alone. See under LET.

Alonely† (a-lōn'li), a. Exclusive.

The alonely rule of the land rested in the queen. Fabyan.

Alonely† (a-lōn'li), adv. Only; merely; singly.

This said spirit was not given alonely unto him, but unto all his heirs and posterity. Latimer.

Aloneness (a-lōn'nes), n. The state of being alone or without company.

Along (a-long'), adv. [This word represents the A. Sax. andlang, endlong, anlong — Teut. prefix and, ant, ent, and long; G. entlang, along. Comp. Fr. le long de, through the length of.] 1. By the length; lengthwise; in a line with the length.

Some laid along,
And bound with burning wires, on spokes of wheels are hung. Dryden.

2. In a line, or with a progressive motion; onward; as, let us walk along. 'A firebrand carried along leaveth a train.' Bacon.—3. In company; together. 'He shall to England along with you.' Shak. — All along, the whole length; through the whole distance; in the whole way or length.

Along (a-long'), prep. By the length of, as distinguished from across; in a longitudinal direction over; as, the troops marched along the banks of the river, or along the highway. 1 Sam. vi. 12.

Along (a-long'), prep. [A. Sax. gelang, owing to, O.E. ilong, and often contracted into long (see LONG, prep.); allied to gelingan, to happen.] Owing to; on account of. It was formerly used with a genitive, later with the prepositions on or of, occasionally with. 'All along of the accursed gold.' Sir W. Scott.

I cannot tell where*on* it was along,
But well I wot great strife is us among. Chaucer.
'Tis all along of you that I am thus haunted.
Henry Brooke.

This preposition is now always followed by of, and its use is mainly confined to the vulgar or uneducated. Sir W. Scott no doubt used it to give an antique flavour to his style. He also used the shorter form long similarly (see LONG).

Alongshore (a-long'shōr), adv. By the shore or coast; lengthwise and near the shore.—Alongshore man, a labourer employed about shipping.

Alongside (a-long'sīd), adv. Along or by the side; beside each other; as, to be alongside of the wall; two vessels lie alongside.

(b) Placed between other bodies of the same or different whorls, as in an umbellifer, where the stamens are alternate with, that is between, the petals.—2. Belonging to a series between every pair in which a member of another series intervenes; having one intervening between each pair; every second; as, only the alternate lines should be read; the odd numbers form one series of alternate numerals, the even numbers another.—3. Consisting of alternate parts or members, proceeding by alternation; as, an alternate series; alternate rhyming; alternate proportion.—Alternate angles, in geom. the internal angles made by two lines with a third, on opposite sides of it. If the two lines are parallel, the alternate angles are equal. Thus, if the parallels A B, C D be cut by the line E F, the angles A G H, G H D, as also the angles B G H and G H C, are called alternate angles.—Alternate proportion, the equal proportion that subsists between the alternate members of the pairs of a series of proportionals. Thus, if $a : b :: c : d$; then, by alternate proportion, $a : c :: b : d$.—Alternate quarters, in her. the first and fourth quarters, and the second and third, which are usually of the same nature.—Alternate generation, in zool. that modification of generation by which the young do not resemble their parent, but their grand-parent or some remote ancestor: called also Heterogenesis, Metagenesis, and Xenogenesis. See HETEROGENESIS.

Alternate Leaves.

Alternate (al-tėr'nāt), n. 1. That which happens by turns with something else; vicissitude. [Rare.]

Rais'd in pleasure, or repos'd in ease,
Grateful alternates of substantial peace.
Prior.

2. In American Presb. Ch. one who takes the place of another in performing duty; a substitute.

Alternate (al'tėr-nāt or al-tėr'nāt), v.t. pret. & pp. alternated; ppr. alternating. [L. alterno, alternatum, to do first one thing then a second. See ALTER.] 1. To perform by turns, or in succession.

Who in their course
Melodious hymns about the sovereign throne
Alternate all night long. Milton.

2. To cause to succeed or follow one another in time or place reciprocally; to interchange reciprocally.

The most high God . . . alternates the disposition of good and evil. Ob. Grew.

Alternate (al'tėr-nāt or al-tėr'nāt), v.i. To follow one another in time or place reciprocally: often followed by with; as, the flood and ebb tides alternate with each other. 'Different species alternating with each other.' Kirwan.

Rage, shame, and grief alternate in his breast.
J. Philips.

Alternately (al-tėr'nāt-li), adv. In an alternate manner: (a) in reciprocal succession; by turns, so that each is succeeded by that which it succeeds, in the same way as night follows day and day follows night. (b) With the omission or intervention of one between each pair; as, read the lines alternately; in French prosody male and female rhymes follow one another in couplets alternately.—Alternately pinnate, in bot. a term used when the leaflets of a pinnate leaf are placed on the one side of a common petiole, opposite the spaces on the other side.

Alternateness (al-tėr'nāt-nes), n. The state or quality of being alternate, or of following in succession.

Alternation (al-tėr-nā'shon), n. 1. The act of alternating, or state of being alternate; the reciprocal succession of things in time or place; the act of following and being followed in succession; as, we observe the alternation of day and night, cold and heat, summer and winter.—2. In math. (a) the different changes or alterations of orders in numbers; called more commonly Permutation. (b) Alternate proportion. See under ALTERNATE.—3. In church ritual, the response of the congregation speaking alternately with the minister.—Alternation of generation. See Alternate Generation under ALTERNATE.

Alternative (al-tėr'na-tiv), a. [Fr. alternatif.] 1. Offering a choice or possibility of one of two things.

The conscience of mankind, and the voice alike of philosophy and of religion, reject with equal horror his (J. S. Mill's) alternative solution of the origin of evil, that the Creator of the world is either the author of evil or the slave of it. Ed. Rev.

2.† Alternate; reciprocal. Holland.—3. In bot. applied to the æstivation or arrangement of the flower-buds of plants, where the inner whorl alternates with the outer.

Alternative (al-tėr'na-tiv), n. A choice between two things, so that if one is taken the other must be left, or a possibility of one of two things, so that if one is false the other must be true. The things in question are also called alternatives, and in strictness the word cannot be applied to more than two things, and when one thing only is offered for choice, it is said there is no alternative.

Between these alternatives there is no middle ground. Cranch.

Alternatively (al-tėr'na-tiv-li), adv. In an alternative manner; in a manner that admits the choice or possibility of one out of two things.

Alternativeness (al-tėr'na-tiv-nes), n. The quality or state of being alternative.

Alternity† (al-tėr'ni-ti), n. Succession by turns; alternation. 'The alternity and vicissitude of rest.' Sir T. Browne.

Althæa (al-thē'a), n. [Gr. althaia, from althō, or althainō, to heal.] A genus of plants, nat. order Malvaceæ, including the hollyhock (A. rosea), and the marsh-mallow (A. officinalis). The so-called A. frutex of the gardens does not belong to the genus, but is a Hibiscus (H. syriacus).

Althein, Altheine (al-thē'in), n. ($C_2H_6SO_4$ or $C_4H_6S_2O_8$.) A white crystallizable substance contained in the root of the mallow (Althæa officinalis) and asparagus; asparagin (which see).

Although (al-THŌ'), conj. [All and though; comp. albeit. See THOUGH.] Grant all this; be it so; allow all; suppose that; admit all that; notwithstanding.—Although, Though. These words approach very nearly in meaning. Although is perhaps the stronger and more pronounced, bringing the adversative proposition into greater prominence. It is, therefore, generally preferred to commence a sentence.

Although all shall be offended, yet will not I.
Mark xiv. 29.

The sound of love makes your soft heart afraid,
And guard itself, though but a child invade.
Waller.

Altiloquence† (al-til'ō-kwens), n. [See ALTILOQUENT.] Lofty speech; pompous language. Bailey.

Altiloquent† (al-til'ō-kwent), a. [L. altus, high, and loquens, loquentis, ppr. of loquor, to speak.] High-sounding; pompous in language. Ash.

Altimeter (al-tim'et-ėr), n. [L. altus, high, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for taking altitudes by geometrical principles, as a quadrant, sextant, or theodolite.

Altimetry (al-tim'et-ri), n. The art of ascertaining altitudes by means of an altimeter, and by trigonometrical principles without actual mensuration.

Altincar (al-tin'kär), n. [See TINCAL.] Crude borax, employed in refining metals; tincal (which see).

Altiscope (al'ti-skōp), n. [L. altus, high, and Gr. skopeō, to look at.] An instrument consisting of an arrangement of lenses and mirrors in a vertical telescopic tube, by means of which a person is able to overlook objects intervening between himself and the object he desires to see. When the sections of the tube are extended, the view is received upon an upper mirror placed at an angle of 45° and reflected thence down the tube to a lower mirror, where it is seen by the observer.

Altisonant, Altisonous (al-tis'o-nant, al-tis'o-nus), a. [L. altus, high, and sonans, sounding, from sonus, sound.] High-sounding; lofty or pompous, as language. 'Altisonant phrases.' Evelyn.

Altitonant (al-tit'o-nant), a. [L. altus, high, and tono, to thunder.] Thundering from on high; high-thundering. [Rare and poetical.]

Altitude (al'ti-tūd), n. [L. altitudo—altus, high, and tudo, a common termination denoting state, condition, or manner.] 1. Space extended upward; height; the elevation of an object above its foundation, the ground, or a given level; or the elevation of one object above another; as, the altitude of a mountain or column; the altitude of a cloud, or of a bird above a tree.—2. The elevation of a point, or star, or other object above the horizon, measured by the arc of a vertical intercepted between such point and the horizon. It is either apparent or true. Apparent altitude is that which appears by observations made at any place on the surface of the earth; true altitude, that which results by correcting the apparent for refraction, parallax, and dip of the horizon.—3. Highest point or degree.

He did it to please his mother, and to be partly proud; which he is, even to the altitude of his virtue. Shak.

4. Elevation of spirit, especially from liquor; haughty air: in this sense generally used in the plural.

The man of law began to get into his altitudes.
Sir W. Scott.

—Accessible altitude, the altitude of an object whose base we can have access to, so as to measure the distance between it and the station from which the measure is to be taken.—Inaccessible altitude, the altitude of an object whose base cannot be approached.—Refraction of altitude, an arc of a vertical circle, by which the true altitude of a heavenly body is increased, on account of refraction.—Parallax of altitude. See PARALLAX.—Altitude, or elevation of the pole, the arc of the meridian intercepted between the pole and the horizon. It is equal to the latitude of the place.—Meridian altitude, an arc of the meridian between the horizon and any star or point on the meridian.

Altitudinarian (al′ti-tū-di-nā″ri-an), a. Aspiring. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Altivolant (al-tiv′ō-lant), a. [L. altus, high, and volans, flying.] Flying high. Bailey. [Rare.]

Alto (al′tō or äl′tō). [It., from L. altus, high.] High; a common element in terms in music and art, derived from the Italian; as, alto-ripieno, alto-rilievo.

Alto (al′tō or äl′tō), n. [So called from being higher than the tenor, to which in old music the melody was assigned.] In music, (a) Same as Contralto. (b) The instrument called in England the tenor-violin, and by the Italians the viola.

Alto-clef (al′tō-klef), n. In music, the C clef, placed upon the third line of the staff, in order that the notes proper for the alto voice may be conveniently represented.

Altogether (ąl-tų-geŦH′ėr), adv. [All and together.] Wholly; entirely; completely; quite.

> Every man at his best state is altogether vanity. Ps. xxxix. 5.

Altometer (al-tom′et-ėr), n. Same as Altimeter (which see).

Alto-relievo (al′tō-rē-lē″vo), n. Same as Alto-rilievo (which see).

Alto-rilievo (äl′tō-rē-lē-ā″vo). [It. See ALTO and RELIEF.] High relief: a term applied in regard to sculptured figures to express that they stand out boldly from the back-ground, projecting more than half their thickness without being entirely detached; thus a piece of sculpture is said to be an alto-rilievo or in alto-rilievo. In mezzo-rilievo, or middle relief, the projection is one-half, and in basso-rilievo, or bas-relief, less than one-half. Alto-rilievo is further distinguished from mezzo-rilievo by some portion of the figures standing usually quite free from the surface on which they are carved, while in the latter the figures though rounded are not detached in any part. Frequently, though less properly, spelled Alto-relievo.

Alto-ripieno (äl′tō-rē-pē-ā″no). [It.] In mus. a tenor part in a great chorus, used only in particular places.

Alto-viola (al′tō-vi′ō-la or äl′tō-vē′ō-lä), n. [It.] The tenor instrument of the violin family.

Altruism (al′trö-izm), n. [It. altrui, Fr. autrui, others, from L. alter, another.] A term first employed by the Positivists, or followers of the French philosopher Comte, to signify devotion to others or to humanity: the opposite of selfishness.

Altruist (al′trö-ist), n. One who practises or advocates altruism.

Altruistic (al-trö-ist′ik), a. Pertaining or relating to altruism; regardful of others; having regard to the well-being or best interests of others: opposed to selfish.

Aludel (al′ū-del), n. [Fr. and Sp.] In old chem. a vessel somewhat resembling the ancient alembic, used for sublimating mercury.

Alula (al-ū′la), n. [L., dim. of ala, a wing.] In ornith. the bastard wing or winglet, consisting of a group of stiff feathers attached to the bone of the wing that represents the thumb.

Alum (al′um), n. [L. alumen.] A general name for a class of double sulphates containing aluminium and such metals as potassium, ammonium, iron, &c. Common or potash alum has the formula $K Al 2 SO_4 + 12 H_2 O$. It is produced by adding potassium sulphate or chloride to crude aluminium sulphate obtained from alum shale by the action of sulphuric acid, or by roasting shale which contains alumina and pyrites, whereby the sulphur of the latter is oxidized to sulphuric acid, which, acting on the alumina, produces aluminium sulphate. Alum crystallizes in beautiful octahedra which are white, transparent, and very astringent. Alum is of great use in medicine and the arts. In medicine it is used as an astringent—internally, in hemoptoë, diarrhœa, and dysentery; externally, as a styptic applied to bleeding vessels, and as an escharotic. In the arts it is used in dyeing, as a mordant to fix colours; in making candles, for hardening the tallow; in tanning, for restoring the cohesion of skins; in baking it is employed to whiten bread. It occurs in a native state only in small quantities.

Alum (al′um), v.t. To steep in or impregnate with a solution of alum.

Alumen (al′ū-men), n. [L.] Alum (which see).

Alumina (al-ū′min-a), n. (Al_2O_3.) The oxide of aluminium, the most abundant of the earths. It is widely diffused over the globe in the shape of clay, loam, and other similar substances; the adamantine spar, the ruby, corundum, and sapphire are alumina nearly pure and crystallized. In these forms alumina is, next to the diamond, the hardest substance known. Its great value in the arts depends on its affinity for vegetable colouring matters and animal fibres. It forms the base of the lakes in dyeing, and acts also as a mordant.

Alumine (al′ū-min), n. Same as Alumina.

Aluminiferous (al-ū′min-if″ėr-us), a. Containing or affording alum, alumina, or aluminium.

Aluminiform (al-ū-min′i-form), a. Having the form of alum, alumina, or aluminium.

Aluminite (al-ū′min-īt), n. Hydrous sulphate of alumina, a mineral that occurs in small roundish or reniform masses. Its colour is snow-white or yellowish-white.

Aluminium, Aluminum (al-ū-min′i-um, al-ū′min-um), n. Chemical sym. Al. At. wt. = 27·5; sp. gr. 2·6 nearly. The metallic base of alumina; a white metal with a bluish tinge, and a lustre somewhat resembling, but far inferior to, that of silver. It does not occur native, but is extracted for the purposes of commerce from several minerals. Being light, hard, tenacious, ductile, malleable, and not liable to tarnish in the air or under the action of water, hot or cold, or of sulphuretted hydrogen, it is employed for many purposes either by itself or in the preparation of alloys, and its use is rapidly extending.—Aluminium bronze, an alloy of aluminium and copper having valuable properties. One variety of it, called aluminium gold, is of a pale gold colour, harder than bronze, and susceptible of a fine polish. It is extensively made into watch chains and trinkets.

Aluminous (al-ū′min-us), a. Pertaining to or containing alum or alumina, or partaking of the same properties; as, aluminous minerals or waters.

Alumish (al′um-ish), a. Having the nature of alum; somewhat resembling alum.

Alumnus (a-lum′nus), n. pl. Alumni (a-lum′-nī). [L. alumnus, a nursling, disciple, from alo, to nourish.] A pupil; one educated at a seminary or university; a graduate or undergraduate of a university, regarded as his alma mater.

Alum-rock (al′um-rok), n. Same as Alum-stone.

Alum-root (al′um-röt), n. A name given to the astringent root of several plants, as Heuchera americana.

Alum-schist, Alum-slate (al′um-shist, al′-um-slāt), n. A thin bedded fissile rock of a grayish, bluish, or iron-black colour, and often possessed of a glossy shining lustre. It is chiefly composed of silica and alumina, and from it is obtained the largest part of the alum of commerce.

Alum-stone (al′um-stōn), n. The siliceous sub-sulphate of alumina and potash; a mineral of a grayish or yellowish white colour, found at Tolfa in Italy, in secondary rocks.

Alunogen (al′un-o-jen), n. [Fr. alun, alum, and Gr. ginomai, I produce.] Native sulphate of aluminium, consisting of 36·05 sulphuric acid, 15·40 alumina, and 48·55 water, occurring in fine capillary fibres. It is found in volcanic solfataras, in clays, and felspar rocks containing pyrites, and as an efflorescence on the walls of mines and quarries.

Alure† (al′ūr), n. [Fr. allure, pace, gait, from aller, to go.] 1. An alley; a walk.—2. A passage, gangway, or gallery in a building. 'The new alure between the king's chamber and the said chapel.' Brayley.—3. The side pavement of a street.

> The sides of every street were covered with fresh alures of marble. T. Warton.

Aluta (a-lū′ta), n. [L., leather dressed with alum.] A species of leather-stone, soft, pliable, and not laminated.

Alutaceous (al-ū-tā′shus), a. Of a pale brown colour, like that of tanned leather.

Alutation† (al-ū-tā′shon), n. [L. aluta, tanned leather.] The tanning of leather.

Alva Marina (al′va ma-rī′na), n. [Corruption for ulva marina, sea-weed.] A name given in commerce to certain dried sea-weeds used for stuffing mattresses, &c.

Alveary (al′vē-a-ri), n. [L. alvearium, alveus, a hollow, a cavity, a bellowing vessel, and particularly a bee-hive, from alvus, the belly.] 1. A bee-hive, or something resembling a bee-hive.—2. The hollow of the external ear, or bottom of the concha where the wax is contained.

Alveated (al′vē-āt-ed), a. Formed or vaulted like a bee-hive.

Alveolar, Alveolary (al′vē-o-lėr, al′vē-o-la-ri), a. [L. alveolus, a small hollow, a socket, dim. of alveus, a hollow vessel. See ALVEARY.] Containing sockets, hollow cells, or pits; pertaining to sockets, specifically the sockets of the teeth; as, the alveolar artery.—Alveolar arches, the parts of the jaws hollowed out by the teeth-sockets.—Alveolar processes, the processes of the maxillary bones containing the sockets of the teeth.—Alveolar structure, a term applied to minute superficial cavities in the mucous membranes of the stomach, esophagus, and small intestines.

Alveolate (al′vē-o-lāt), a. [L. alveolatus, from alveus, a hollow vessel.] Deeply pitted, so as to resemble a honey-comb; having the surface covered with numerous deep hollows, as in the receptacle of some compound flowers.

Alveole (al′vē-ōl), n. Same as Alveolus.

Alveolite (al′vē-o-līt), n. [L. alveolus, a socket.] In geol. a genus of Devonian corals composed of concentrically arranged tables of short tubes, externally angular, and rounded within. Page.

Alveolus (al-vē′o-lus), n. pl. Alveoli (al-vē′-o-lī). [L., a little hollow, dim. of alveus.] 1. A cell in a honey-comb or in a fossil.—2. The socket in the jaw, in which a tooth is fixed.

Alveus (al′vē-us), n. [L., a hollow vessel, a channel.] 1. In anat. a tube or canal through which some fluid flows; especially, the larger part of such a tube, as the duct conveying the chyle to the subclavian vein. 2. The bed or channel of a river.

Alvine (al′vīn), a. [From L. alvus, the belly.] Belonging to the belly or intestines; relating to the intestinal excrements.—Alvine concretion, a calculus formed in the stomach or intestines.

Alway† (al′wā), adv. Same as Always.

> Mephibosheth shall eat bread alway at my table. 2 Sam. ix. 10.

Always (al′wāz), adv. [All and way; A. Sax. eal, and weg, a way. Comp. algate, algates, from gate, a way; It. tutta via, Sp. todas vias.] 1. Perpetually; uninterruptedly; continually; as, God is always the same.

> Ey'n in heaven his (Mammon's) looks and thoughts
> Were always downward bent. Milton.

2. As often as occasion recurs; as, he always comes home on Saturday.

> Always the dulness of the fool is the whetstone of the wits. Shak.

Alyned† (a-līnd′), p. and a. [L. allino, to besmear.] Anointed.

Alyssum, Alysson (a-lis′sum, a-lis′son), n. [Gr. a, priv., and lyssa, canine madness, as the ancients believed it to cure hydrophobia and allay anger.] A genus of plants, nat. order Cruciferæ, containing several white or yellow flowered plants, much employed for decorating rock-work. A. maritimum (Koniga maritima) is much cultivated in gardens, having white and fragrant honey-scented flowers, to which the bees are very partial. Several species are cultivated under the name of madwort.

Am (am). [A. Sax. eom, for hypothetical eorm, irm, ism; compare the similar forms in the cognate languages, Goth. im for ism, Icel. em for erm, esm, Lith. esmi, L. sum, Gr. eimi, Per. am, Skr. asmi, made up of root as, to breathe, exist, be, and mi, cognate with E. me=I. In the conjugation of the verb to be three different roots are employed; seen in am, was, be.] The first person of the verb to be, in the indicative mood, present tense.

I am that I am. Ex. iii. 14.

Ama (ā'ma), n. [L. hama, Gr. hamē, a water-bucket, a pail. See AAM.] 1. Eccles. (a) the vessel used for holding the wine and water of the eucharist. The body of the ama is sometimes formed of glass or agate, mounted in gold, and jewelled. Now called Cruet. (b) The wine itself.—2.† A wine measure.

Amas which belonged to the Abbey of St. Denis.

Amability† (am-a-bil'i-ti), n. [L. amabilis, from amo, to love.] Lovableness; amiability.

No rules can make amability. Jer. Taylor.

Amacratic (am-a-krat'ik), a. [Gr. hama, together, and kratos, power.] In photog. same as Amasthenic (which see).

Amadou (am'a-dō), n. [Fr. amadou, German tinder, touchwood: a word believed to be of Scandinavian origin; comp. Icel. mata, food, bait; Dan. mad, meat, made, to feed, to bait, the word originally meaning the food or bait of fire.] A soft leathery substance used for tinder, consisting of the silky portion of a fungus (Polyporus fomentarius) found growing on forest trees, left remaining after the plant has been deprived of its skin and pores by being beaten and steeped in saltpetre. It has been employed by surgeons as a styptic. Called Black Match, Pyrotechnical Sponge, or German Tinder, on account of its inflammability.

Amain (a-mān'), adv. [Prefix a, in, on, and main, force. See MAIN.] With force, strength, or violence; violently; furiously; suddenly; at once. 'When we fled amain.' Milton.—Let go amain or strike amain (naut.), to let fall or lower at once.

Amaist (a-māst'), adv. Almost. [Scotch.]

Amalgam (a-mal'gam), n. [Gr. malagma, a soft mass, from malassō, to soften.] 1. A compound of mercury or quicksilver with another metal; any metallic alloy of which mercury forms an essential constituent part. Specifically—2. A native compound of mercury and silver found in fine crystals in mines in which veins of copper and silver cross each other.—3. Fig. a mixture or compound of different things.

Amalgam† (a-mal'gam), v.i. To amalgamate. 'Quicksilver easily amalgams with metals.' Boyle.

Amalgam,† Amalgame† (a-mal'gam), v.t. To mix, as metals by amalgamation; to amalgamate. 'No more, sir, of gold to amalgame with some six of mercury.' B. Jonson.

Amalgama† (a-mal'ga-ma), n. Same as Amalgam.

They have divided this their amalgama into a number of republics. Burke.

Amalgamate (a-mal'gam-āt), a. United or coalesced: a term applied to a language the words of which are formed by the coalescence or amalgamation of roots, as the Aryan or Indo-European languages.

Amalgamate (a-mal'gam-āt), v.t. 1. To compound or mix, as quicksilver with another metal.—2. To mix different things to make a compound; to blend; to unite.

Ingratitude is indeed their four cardinal virtues compacted and amalgamated into one. Burke.

Amalgamate (a-mal'gam-āt), v.i. 1. To compound or unite in an amalgam; to blend with another metal, as quicksilver. Hence—2. To unite or coalesce, generally; as, two organs or parts amalgamate as the result of growth.

Amalgamation (a-mal'ga-mā"shon), n. 1. The act or operation of compounding mercury with another metal; specifically, the process of separating gold and silver from their ores by combining them with mercury. The mercury readily dissolves these metals as disseminated in the minerals, and uniting with them separates them from the foreign matters. The mercury is afterwards driven off from the amalgam by heat.—2. The mixing or blending of different things or races; the result of such mixing or blending; complete union.

Early in the fourteenth century the amalgamation of the races was all but complete. Macaulay.

3. The junction or union of two or more joint-stock companies into one concern.

Amalgamator (a-mal'ga-mā-tėr), n. One who or that which amalgamates.

Amalgame.† See AMALGAM, v.t.

Amalgamize (a-mal'gam-īz), v.t. To amalgamate. [Rare.]

Amalphitan (a-mal'fi-tan), a. Pertaining to Amalfi, a seaport town of Italy.—Amalphitan code, the oldest existing code of maritime law, compiled during the first crusade by the authorities of Amalfi, which town then possessed considerable commerce and maritime power.

Amand† (a-mand'), v.t. [L. amando—a, away, and mando, to commit, to send word to.] To send one away.

Amand (a-mand'), n. [Fr. amende, a fine.] In Scots law, sometimes used of a fine or penalty; formerly also a sum required to be lodged by the defender in a suit who proponed improbation, as a security that he did not do so merely with a view to delay or evasion.

Amandine (a-man'din), n. [Fr. amande, an almond. See ALMOND.] A kind of paste or cold cream for chapped hands, prepared from almonds.

Amandola (a-man'dō-la), n. [It. and Pr., an almond.] A green marble with white spots, having the appearance of honey-comb; of 100 parts, 76 are mild calcareous earth, 20 schist, and 2 iron. The cellular appearance proceeds from the schist.

Amanitin, Amanitine (a-man'i-tin), n. [Gr. amanitēs, a sort of fungus.] An organic base, the supposed poisonous principle of certain mushrooms, as Agaricus muscarius, A. bulbosus, and others.

Amanuensis (a-man'ū-en"sis), n. pl. Amanuenses (a-man'ū-en"sēz). [L. a, from, and manus, the hand=servus a manu, a secretary.] A person whose employment is to write what another dictates, or to copy what has been written by another.

I had not that happy leisure; no amanuensis, no assistants. Burton.

Amaracus (a-mar'a-kus), n. [L., marjoram. See MARJORAM.] Marjoram.

And at their feet the crocus brake like fire,
Violet, amaracus, and asphodel,
Lotos and lilies. Tennyson.

Amaranth (am'a-ranth), n. [Gr. amarantos—a, neg., and marainō, to decay: so called because when cropped it does not soon wither.] 1. A plant of the genus Amaranthus (which see).—2. In poetry, an imaginary flower supposed never to fade.

Immortal amaranth! a flower which once
In Paradise, fast by the tree of life,
Began to bloom; but soon, for man's offence,
To heaven removed, where first it grew. Milton.

3. A colour inclining to purple.

Amaranthaceæ (am'a-ran-thā"sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of apetalous plants, chiefly inhabiting tropical countries, where they are often troublesome weeds. They are remarkable for the white or sometimes reddish scales of which their flowers are composed. To this order belong the cock's-comb, the globe-amaranth, the prince's-feather, and the love-lies-bleeding of our gardens.

Amaranthine (am-a-ranth'in), a. 1. Belonging to amaranth; consisting of, containing, or resembling amaranth.

Those happy souls that dwell
In yellow meads of asphodel
Or amaranthine bowers. Pope.

2. Never-fading, like the amaranth of the poets; imperishable.

The only amaranthine flower on earth
Is virtue; the only lasting treasure, truth. Cowper.

3. Of a purplish colour.

Amaranthus (am-a-ranth'us), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Amaranthaceæ. The species are found chiefly in tropical countries, and are all annuals. The tricoloured species (A. tricolor), from China, has long been cultivated in gardens on account of the beauty of its variegated leaves. A. hypochondriacus is prince's-feather; A. caudatus, love-lies-bleeding.

Amaritude (a-mar'i-tūd), n. [L. amaritudo, from amarus, bitter.] Bitterness. Harvey. [Rare.]

Amaryllidaceæ (am-a-ril'li-dā"sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of monocotyledonous plants, with six stamens and an inferior fruit, which comprehends the daffodil, the Guernsey and belladonna lilies, the Brunsvigias and blood-flowers of the Cape of Good Hope. The roots are generally bulbous, the flowers on a spathe, and the leaves sword-shaped. The bulbs of some are poisonous, especially those of Hæmanthus toxicarius and some neighbouring species, in which the Hottentots are said to dip their arrow-heads. The bulbs of Narcissus poeticus and some other species are emetic. The genus Amaryllis gives the name to the order.

Amaryllis (am-a-ril'lis), n. [Female name in Virgil and Theocritus.] A genus of plants, comprising a great number of species and varieties, the type of the nat. order Amaryllidaceæ, many of which are cultivated in gardens for the beauty of their flowers. See AMARYLLIDACEÆ.

Ambassade† (am′bas-sād), n. [Fr.] Embassy. 'You disgrace me in my ambassade.' Shak.

Ambassador (am-bas′sa-dor), n. [Fr. ambassadeur, from ambassade, an embassy, a word which, with the allied forms, such as Pr. ambaissada, ambaissat, It. ambasciata, Sp. ambaxada, L.L. ambassata, ambasiata, &c., is derived from the L.L. ambactia, 'which figures in the most ancient Low Latin texts with the meaning of service, employment, mission.' Littré. Ambactia must come either from L. ambactus, a vassal, a dependant, a word used by Cæsar, and said to be a Latinized form of a Celtic word; or from a Teutonic word which appears as Goth. andbahts, a servant or attendant; A. Sax. ambiht, ambeht, a servant, a messenger; Icel. ambátt, a handmaid; Dan. embede, office, employment; D. ambacht, trade, employment; G. amt, office. The Goth. andbahts is probably (as Pott thinks) from prefix and (the an in answer), and a root allied to Skr. bhaj, to serve or honour.] A minister of the highest rank, employed by one prince or state at the court of another to manage the public concerns, or support the interests of his own prince or state, and representing the power and dignity of his sovereign or state. Ambassadors are ordinary when they reside permanently at a foreign court, or extraordinary when they are sent on a special occasion. When ambassadors extraordinary have full powers, as of concluding peace, making treaties, and the like, they are called plenipotentiaries. Ambassadors are also called ministers; as, the French minister at the court of St. James's. Envoys are ministers employed on special occasions, and are of less dignity than ambassadors. The term ambassador is commonly used by writers on public law to designate every kind of diplomatic agent or minister.

An ambassador is an honest man sent to lie abroad for the commonwealth. Sir H. Wotton.

[The spelling Embassador is obsolete, though Embassy, and not Ambassy, is now always written.]

Ambassadorial (am-bas′sa-dō″ri-al), a. Belonging to an ambassador.

The foreign affairs were conducted by a separate department, called the ambassadorial office. Brougham.

Amber (am′bér), n. [Fr. ambre, It. ambra, Sp. ambar, from the Ar. ambar, anbar, ambergris.] 1. A mineralized pale-yellow, and sometimes reddish or brownish, resin of extinct pine-trees, occurring in beds of lignite and in alluvial soils, but found most abundantly on the shores of the Baltic, where it is thrown up by the sea between Königsberg and Memel. It is a hard translucent substance, brittle, having a specific gravity of 1·07, without taste or smell, except when heated, when it emits a fragrant odour. Its most remarkable quality is its capability of becoming negatively electric by friction; indeed the word electricity is derived from ēlektron, the Greek term for amber. It sometimes incloses flies and remains of extinct species. It yields by distillation an empyreumatic oil consisting of a mixture of hydrocarbons and succinic acid. It is used now chiefly for pipe mouthpieces and beads, and in the arts for amber-varnish.—2.† Ambergris. 'You that smell of amber at my charge.' Beau. & Fl.

Amber (am′bér), a. Consisting of or resembling amber; of the colour of amber.

What time the amber morn
Forth gushes from beneath a low-hung cloud.
Tennyson.

Amber† (am′bér), v.t. To scent or flavour with amber or ambergris.

Be sure
The wines be lusty, high, and full of spirit,
And amber'd all. Beau. & Fl.

Amber (am′bér), n. [A. Sax.] An old English measure of 4 bushels.

Ambergris (am′bér-grēs), n. [Fr. ambre gris (gris, gray), gray amber. See AMBER.] A solid, opaque, ash-coloured inflammable substance, variegated like marble, remarkably light, rugged on its surface, and having, when heated, a fragrant odour. It does not effervesce with acids; it melts easily into a kind of yellow resin, and is highly soluble in spirit of wine. It is a morbid secretion of the intestines of the spermaceti whale, the Catodon (Physeter) macrocephalus. It is usually found floating on the surface of the ocean in regions frequented by whales, or on the shore, as on the coasts of the Bahama Islands; sometimes in masses of from 60 to 225 lbs. weight. In this substance are found the beaks of the cuttle-fish, on which the whale is known to feed. It is highly valued as a material in perfumery, and was formerly prized for spicing wines.

Amber-seed (am'bėr-sēd), n. The seed of Abelmoschus moschatus, imported from Egypt and the West Indies. It resembles millet in appearance, has a bitterish taste, and a smell like that of musk. It is used to perfume pomatum. Called also Musk-seed.

Amen (ā'men'). [Heb. āmēn, firm, established, allied to Ar. amūn, faithful; Chal. āman, to trust.] A term used in devotions, occurring generally at the end of a prayer, and meaning So be it. At the end of a creed it is equivalent to a solemn assertion of belief.

> One cried, God bless us! and, Amen! the other.
> But wherefore could I not pronounce Amen?
> I had most need of blessing, and Amen
> Stuck in my throat. Shak.

In the Roman Catholic version of the New Testament, published at Rheims in 1582, it is used where the Authorized Version has verily, being the word used in the original.

> Amen, amen I say unto thee, Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God. Jn. iii. 3.

It is used as a noun to denote Christ as being one who is true and faithful. 'These things saith the Amen.' Rev. iii. 14. It is used as an adjective to signify made true, verified, fulfilled.

> All the promises of God in him (Christ) are yea, and in him Amen. 2 Cor. i. 20.

Amendment (a-mend'ment), n. 1. The act of making better, or changing for the better, in any way, as by the correction of faults, the removal of superfluities, the supplying of deficiencies, the substitution of one thing for another, &c.; improvement; reformation. 'Amendment of life.' Hooker.

Her works are so perfect that there is no place for amendments. Ray.

2. The act of becoming better, or state of having become better; specifically, recovery of health.

Your honour's players, hearing your amendment,
Are come to play a pleasant comedy. Shak.

3. In parliamentary proceedings, an alteration proposed to be made in the draft of any bill, or in the terms of any motion under discussion; also, any alteration proposed in the terms of any motion or resolution brought forward at a public meeting. Sometimes an amendment is moved, the effect of which is entirely to reverse the sense of the original motion.—4. In law, the correction of an error in a writ or process.—SYN. Correction, improvement, reformation, amelioration, betterment.

Amends (a-mendz'), n. pl. Compensation for a loss or injury; recompense; satisfaction; equivalent. 'Yet thus far fortune maketh us amends.' Shak.

Amendsful (a-mendz'fụl), a. Making amends. Goodrich.

Amenity (a-men'i-ti), n. [L. amœnitas, Fr. aménité, L. amœnus, pleasant.] The quality of being pleasant or agreeable, whether in respect of situation, prospect, climate, temper, disposition, manners, or the like; pleasantness; pleasingness. 'Paradises for amenity.' Bp. Richardson. 'The amenity of the story.' Dr. H. More.

The climate has not seduced by its amenities. W. Howitt.

To this . . . he added a sweetness and amenity of temper which extorted the praises even of his political opponents. Buckle.

—Amenity damages, damages given for the defacements of grounds, especially around dwelling-houses, or otherwise for annoyance or loss of amenity caused by the passing of a railway, the construction of public works, and the like.

A Mensa et Thoro. [L., from board or table and bed.] In law, a phrase descriptive of a kind of divorce in which the husband and wife separate, but the husband maintains the wife, and the marriage bond is not dissolved; now superseded by a decree of judicial separation.

Ament (am'ent), n. Same as Amentum (which see).

Amentaceæ (a-men-tā'sē-ē), n. pl. A group of plants whose flowers are arranged in an amentum or catkin, and which were formerly considered to form a natural order, but which later botanists have separated into several different orders, as Cupuliferæ, Salicaceæ, Betulaceæ, Platanaceæ, and Myricaceæ.

Amentaceous (a-men-tā'shus), a. In bot. (a) consisting of or resembling an amentum; as, an amentaceous inflorescence. (b) Furnished with amenta; as, amentaceous plants.

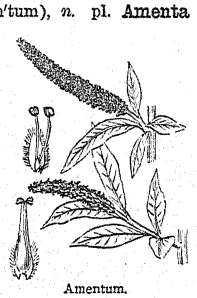
Amentia (a-men'shi-a), n. [L., want of reason—a, without, and mens, mentis, mind. See MIND.] Imbecility of mind; idiocy or dotage.

Amentum (a-men'tum), n. pl. Amenta (a-men'ta). [L. amentum, a thong for throwing a spear, also a shoestrap.] In bot. a kind of inflorescence consisting of unisexual apetalous flowers in the axils of scales or bracts ranged along a stalk or axis; a catkin. The true amentum or catkin is articulated with the branch and deciduous, and is well seen in the willow, birch, oak, poplar, and hazel.



Amentum.

Willow (Salix fragilis), male and female, with separate flowers.

Amenuse,† v.t. [Fr. amenuiser, to make small—a for ad, to, and menuiser, from menu, little, and that from L. minutus, minute. See MINUTE.] To lessen; to diminish. 'If he amenuse or withdraw the almesse of the poor.' Chaucer.

Amerce (a-mėrs'), v.t. pret. & pp. amerced; ppr. amercing. [Fr. amercié, fined at the mercy of the court—à, at, and merci, mercy.] 1. To punish by a pecuniary penalty, the amount of which is not fixed by law, but left to the discretion of the court; as, the court amerced the criminal in the sum of £100.—2. To punish by inflicting a penalty of any kind, as by depriving of some right or privilege, or entailing some loss upon; to punish in general. 'Millions of spirits for his fault amerced of heaven.' Milton. 'Shall by him be amerced with penance due.' Spenser.

Amerceable (a-mėrs'a-bl), a. Liable to amercement.

Amercement (a-mėrs'ment), n. 1. The act of amercing, or state of being amerced.—2. In law, a pecuniary penalty inflicted on an offender at the discretion of the court. It differs from a fine, in that the latter is, or was originally, a fixed and certain sum prescribed by statute for an offence, while an amercement is arbitrary; hence the practice of affeering. See AFFEER.—Amercement royal, a penalty imposed on an officer for a misdemeanour in his office.

Amercer (a-mėrs'ėr), n. One who amerces.

Amerciament (a-mėr'si-a-ment), n. Same as Amercement, 2.

American (a-mer'i-kan), a. [The name America arose from a misunderstanding. Martin Waltzemüller or Waldseemüller, a native and teacher in the gymnasium of St. Dié, in Lorraine, gave the name Americi Terra in 1507 to South America, or those parts of it said to have been discovered by Amerigo Vespucci, an Italian mariner, who under the Portuguese made two voyages to America between 1501 and 1504. This name, which was rapidly adopted in Germany, and extended to the whole continent, was gradually adopted also in other countries. The mainland was first seen in 1497 by Sebastian Cabot, who sailed under the patronage of Henry VII. of England.] Pertaining to America; in a restricted sense, pertaining to the United States; as, the American navy.—American leather, a kind of varnished or enamelled cloth, prepared in imitation of leather, for covering chairs, sofas, &c.

American (a-mer'i-kan), n. A native of America: originally applied to the aboriginal races found there by the Europeans, but now applied to the descendants of Europeans born in America; and, in a restricted sense, to the inhabitants of the United States.

Americanism (a-mer'i-kan-izm), n. 1. The love or preference which American citizens have to their own country, or its interests, customs, &c.; the exhibition of such preference; as, his Americanism is of the most pronounced type.—2. A word, phrase, or idiom peculiar to the English language as spoken in America, and not forming part of the language as spoken in England. [There are also of course Spanish and Portuguese Americanisms in a similar sense.]

Americanize (a-mer'i-kan-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. americanized; ppr. americanizing. 1. To render American or like what prevails or is characteristic of America (especially the United States) and its institutions.

The line of argument has been adopted by the right honourable gentleman opposite with regard to what he terms americanizing the institutions of the country. Gladstone.

2. To naturalize in America.

Ames-ace (āmz'ās), n. A double ace; an ambs-ace.

Ametabola, Ametabolia (a-met-tab'o-la, a'-met-a-bō"li-a), n. pl. [Gr. ametabolos, unchangeable—a, priv., and metaballō, to throw in a different position, to change—meta, implying change, and ballō, to throw.] A division of insects, including only the apterous or wingless insects, as lice, springtails, &c., which do not undergo any metamorphosis, but which escape from the egg nearly under the same form which they preserve through life.

Ametabolian (a'met-a-bō"li-an), n. In zool. an insect that does not undergo a metamorphosis. See AMETABOLA.

Ametabolic (a-met-a-bol"ik), a. [Gr. a, priv., and metabolē, change. See AMETABOLA.] In zool. a term applied to those insects which do not possess wings when perfect, and which do not therefore pass through any well-marked metamorphosis.

Amethodical (a-me-thod'ik-al), a. [Prefix a, not, and methodical (which see).] Unmethodical; irregular; without order. Bailey. [Rare.]

Amethodist† (a-meth'od-ist), n. [Gr. amethodos, without plan or method. See METHOD.] A quack. 'Empirical*l amethodists.*' Whitlock.

Amethyst (am'ē-thist), n. [L. amethystus; Gr. amethystos—a, neg., and methyō, to inebriate, from some supposed quality in the stone of preventing or curing intoxication.] 1. A violet-blue or purple variety of quartz, the colour being due to the presence of peroxide of iron. It generally occurs crystallized in hexahedral prisms or pyramids; also in rolled fragments, composed of imperfect prismatic crystals. Its fracture is conchoidal or splintery. It is wrought into various articles of jewelry. The finest amethysts come from India, Ceylon, and Brazil. —Oriental amethyst, a rare violet-coloured gem, a variety of alumina or corundum, of extraordinary brilliancy and beauty.—2. In her. a purple colour: the same in a nobleman's escutcheon as purpure in a gentleman's and mercury in that of a prince.

Amethystine (a-mē-thist'in), a. 1. Pertaining to or resembling amethyst; anciently applied to a garment of the colour of amethyst, as distinguished from the Tyrian and hyacinthine purple.—2. Composed of amethyst; as, an amethystine cup.

Amharic (am-hä'rik), n. [From Amhara, a province in Abyssinia.] The vernacular language of South-western Abyssinia, a corrupt and barbarous dialect of Arabic, with many African elements.

Amherstia (am-hėrst'i-a), n. [In honour of Countess Amherst, a zealous promoter of botany.] A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosæ. The flowers are large, bright vermilion with yellow spots, and form a raceme about 3 feet long. There is only one species, the A. nobilis, a native of Burmah, in which country the flowers are collected and laid before the shrines of Buddha.

Amia (am'i-a), n. A genus of ganoid fishes found in the rivers of America, and constituting the family Amiidæ (which see).

Amiability (ā'mi-a-bil''i-ti), n. The quality of being amiable or lovable; excellence of disposition; amiableness.

Amiable (ā'mi-a-bl), a. [Under this form there are probably two kindred words mixed up, namely Fr. aimable, lovely, amiable, from L. amabilis, from amo to love; Fr. amiable, amicable, L. amicabilis.] 1.† Exciting or tending to excite love or delight; lovely; beautiful; delightful; pleasing. 'How amiable are thy tabernacles, O Lord.' Ps. lxxxiv. 1.

Come set thee down upon this flow'ry bed,
While I thy amiable cheeks do coy. Shak.

There is nothing more amiable in nature than the character of a truly good man. Clarke.

2. Possessing such agreeable moral qualities as sweetness of temper, kind-heartedness, or the like; having an excellent disposition; lovable; as, an amiable girl; an amiable disposition. See extract.

This (word) and 'lovely' have been so far differentiated that 'amiable' never expresses now any other than moral loveliness; which in 'lovely' is seldom or never implied. Abp. Trench.

3.† Exhibiting love or a show of love; proceeding from love.

Lay an amiable siege to the honesty of this Ford's wife. Shak.

Amiableness (ā'mi-a-bl-nes), n. The quality of being amiable; loveliness; amiability.

Amiably (ā'mi-a-bli), adv. 1. In an amiable manner; in a manner to excite or attract love.—2.† Pleasingly; delightfully. 'The palaces rise so amiably.' Sir T. Herbert. [Rare.]

They (the parables) are so amiably perspicuous, vigorous, and bright. Blackwall.

Amianth, Amianthus (am'i-anth, am-i-an'thus), n. [Gr. amiantos—a, neg., and miainō, to pollute or vitiate: so called from its incombustibility.] Flexible asbestos, earth-flax, or mountain-flax; a mineral occurring generally in serpentine veins, somewhat resembling flax, usually grayish or of a greenish-white colour. It is composed of delicate filaments, very flexible, and somewhat elastic, often long and resembling threads of silk. It is incombustible, and has sometimes been wrought into cloth and paper by the aid of flax, which is afterwards removed by a red heat. It has also been employed as lamp-wicks, and for filling gas-grates, the fibres remaining red-hot without being consumed. It is a finer variety of asbestos (which see).

Amianthiform (am-i-an'thi-form), a. [Amianth and form.] Having the form or likeness of amianth.

Amianthinite (am-i-an'thin-īt), n. A species of amorphous mineral, a variety of actinolite; its colour is ash, greenish, or yellowish-gray, often mixed with yellow or red; its fracture confusedly foliated and fibrous.

Amianthoid (am-i-an'thoid), n. [Amianth, and Gr. eidos, form.] A mineral which occurs in tufts, composed of long capillary filaments, flexible and very elastic; more flexible than the fibres of asbestos, but stiffer and more elastic than those of amianth. The colour is olive-green or greenish-white. It is a variety of hornblende.

Amianthoid (am-i-an'thoid), a. Resembling amianth in form.

Amianthus. See AMIANTH.

Amicability (am'ik-a-bil''i-ti), n. Quality of being amicable; amicableness.

Amicable (am'ik-a-bl), a. [L. amicabilis, from amicus, a friend, from amo, to love.] Characterized by or exhibiting friendship, peaceableness, or harmony; friendly; peaceable; harmonious in social or mutual transactions; as, an amicable arrangement; an amicable adjustment of differences. 'His kindness and humanity, and amicable disposition, and affability and pleasantness of temper.' Wood.—Amicable action, in law, an action commenced and prosecuted according to a mutual understanding, for the purpose of obtaining a decision of the courts on some matter of law involved in it.—Amicable numbers, in arith. such as are mutually equal to the sum of one another's aliquot parts.—Amicable, Friendly. Amicable is negative; friendly is positive: amicable simply implies a degree of friendship such as that we do not wish to disagree with those with whom we are on amicable terms; friendly means that the relations are of an active character, that we have done something to attain, and would do more to retain, the relation.—SYN. Friendly, peaceable, harmonious.

Amicableness (am'ik-a-bl-nes), n. The quality of being amicable, peaceable, friendly, or disposed to peace; a disposition to preserve peace and friendship; friendliness.

Amicably (am'ik-a-bli), adv. In an amicable or friendly manner; with harmony; without controversy; as, the dispute was amicably adjusted.

Amical† (a-mī'kal or am'ik-al), a. Friendly; amicable. 'An amical call to repentance.' W. Watson.

Amice (am'is), n. [O.Fr. amis, amit, Fr. amict, from L. amictus, an upper or outer garment, from amicio, amictum, to wrap round—prefix am, around, and jacio, jactum, to throw.] Something wrapped round a person; specifically, (a) a flowing cloak formerly worn by priests and pilgrims.

A palmer's amice wrapped him round,
With a wrought Spanish baldrick bound.
Sir W. Scott.

(b) An oblong piece or strip of fine linen, with an embroidered apparel sewed upon it, falling down the shoulders like a cope, worn under the alb by priests of the Roman Catholic Church when engaged in the service of the mass. It was originally temporarily placed on the head till the other vestments were arranged, after which it was turned down with the apparel outwards, so that when reposing on the shoulders it resembled an embroidered collar. To this position on the head is to be referred its later symbolism as a helmet of salvation. The bands worn by some Protestant clergymen are a relic of the amice.

1, Amice round the neck. 2, Amice worn as a hood.

Arrayed in habit black and amice thin,
Like to a holy monk the service to begin. Spenser.

Amict (am'ikt), n. Same as Amice.

Amicus Curiæ (a-mī'kus kū'ri-ē), n. [L.] In law, a friend of the court; a person in court who informs the judge of an error he has noticed or makes any useful suggestion.

Amid, Amidst (a-mid', a-midst'), prep. [Prefix a, on, in, and mid, midst. In A. Sax. it appears as on-middan, on-middum, later as amidde, amiddes; the t has been tacked on as in against; the es is an adverbial genit. termination. See MID, MIDDLE, &c.] In the midst or middle; surrounded or encompassed by; mingled with; among. Amid is used chiefly in poetry. 'Placed far amid the melancholy main.' Thomson. 'Amidst the garden.' Milton.

Amide, Amine (am'id, am'in), n. In chem. names given to a series of salts produced by the substitution of elements or radicals for the hydrogen atoms of ammonia: often used as terminations of the names of such salts. When these hydrogen atoms are replaced by acid radicals, the salts are called amides, as $NH_2C_2H_3O$ (acetamide); while if the replacing radicals are basic, the salts are termed amines, as NH_2K (potassamine) and $NH_2C_2H_5$ (ethylamine).

Amidin, Amidine (am'id-in), n. ($C_{24}H_{20}O_{20}$.) A peculiar substance procured from wheat and potato starch. It is opaque or semi-transparent, white or yellowish-white, inodorous, insipid, and very friable. It forms the soluble or gelatinous part of starch.

Amidogen (a-mid'ō-jen), n. [Amide, and Gr. gennaō, to produce—the generator of amides.] A basifying principle composed of two equivalents of hydrogen and one of nitrogen (NH_2). It has not been isolated, but may be traced in the compounds called amides and amines. Thus acetamide is a compound of acetum and amidogen; potassamine, of potassium and amidogen.

Amidships (a-mid'ships), adv. In or towards the middle or the middle line of a ship; as, to put the helm amidships.

Amidward (a-mid'wąrd), adv. Towards the middle line of a ship.

Amiidæ (am-ī'i-dē), n. pl. A family of recent ganoid fishes, approaching more closely than the other families of the order to the ordinary bony fishes. The skin is covered with small, thin, rounded scales, coated with enamel, and the caudal fin is scarcely unsymmetrical. The species of this family, which are few in number, inhabit the fresh waters of America. One of the largest is the Amia calva.

Amilene (am'il-ēn), n. Same as Amylene.

Amine. See AMIDE.

Amir (a-mēr'), n. Same as Emir (which see).

Amiral† (am'i-ral), n. An admiral. See AMMIRAL

Amis† (am'is), n. An amice. Spenser. See AMICE.

Amiss (a-mis'), a. or adv. [Prefix a, and miss. See MISS.] 1. Wrong; faulty; out of time or order; improper: used only as a predicate; as, it may not be amiss to ask advice.

There's somewhat in this world amiss
Shall be unriddled by and by. Tennyson.

—To be not amiss, to be passable or suitable; to be pretty fair; to be not so very bad after all: a phrase used to express approval, but not in a very emphatic way. [Colloq.]

She's a miss, she is; and yet she an't amiss—eh?
Dickens.

2. In a faulty manner; contrary to propriety, truth, law, or morality.

Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss.
Jam. iv. 3.

Amiss† (a-mis'), n. Fault; wrong. 'Some great amiss.' Shak.

Pale be my looks to witness my amiss. Lyly.

Amissibility (a-mis'i-bil''i-ti), n. The capability or possibility of being lost. [Rare.]

Notions of popular rights, and the amissibility of sovereign power for misconduct, were broached.
Hallam.

Amissible (a-mis'i-bl), a. [L. amissibilis.] Capable of being or liable to be lost. [Rare.]

Amission† (a-mi'shon), n. [L. amissio, amissionis, from amitto—a, away, and mitto, to send.] Loss. 'Amission of their church membership.' Dr. H. More.

Amit† (a-mit'), v.t. [L. amitto, to lose.] To lose. Sir T. Browne.

Amity (am'i-ti), n. [Fr. amitié, O.Fr. amisté, Pr. amistat; from a L.L. amicitas (used instead of Class. L. amicitia, friendship), from amicus, a friend, from amo, to love.] Friendship, in a general sense; harmony; good understanding, especially between nations; political friendship; as, a treaty of amity and commerce.

Great Britain was in league and amity with all the world. Sir J. Davies.

SYN. Harmony, kindness, affection, friendship, good-will.

Amma (am'ma), n. [A word probably formed from the earliest sound uttered by an infant, and hence recognized in the name for mother, nurse, in many tongues; comp. G. amme, a wet-nurse; O.G. amma, a mother; Heb. em; Syr. ama, a mother. Comp. also mamma; L. mamma, a breast.] An abbess or spiritual mother in the Greek Church.

Amma (am'ma), n. [Gr., a band.] A girdle or truss used in ruptures.

Amman (am'man), n. [Contr. from G. amtmann, courtman or officer—amt, from ambacht, duty, office. See AMBASSADOR.] An officer who, in Switzerland and in some parts of Germany, exercises judicial functions in a limited district of country.

Ammi (am'mē), n. [Gr. ammos, sand.] A genus of umbelliferous plants, growing in the Mediterranean region, and having the habit of the carrot, but with the outer petals of the umbel very large. They are sometimes called bishop-weeds. None of them are natives of Britain, our bishop-weed being the Ægopodium podagraria, otherwise called goutwort.

Ammiral† (am'mi-ral), n. 1. Admiral.—2. A ship carrying an admiral; any large ship. See ADMIRAL.

His spear—to equal which the tallest pine
Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some great ammiral, were but a wand—
He walk'd with to support uneasy steps
Over the burning marle. Milton.

Ammit† (am'mit), n. [See AMICE.] An amice.

Their motley habits, maniples and stoles,
Albs, ammits, rochets, chimers, hoods, and cowls.
Oldham.

Ammite, Hammite (am'mīt, ham'mīt), n. [Gr. ammos, sand.] An old mineralogical name for roe-stone or oolite, and for all those sandstones composed of rounded and loosely compacted grains like oolite. See OOLITE.

Ammochryse (am'mō-krīs), n. [Gr. ammos, sand, and chrysos, gold.] A yellow soft stone, found in Germany, consisting of glossy yellow particles. When rubbed or ground it has been used to strew over fresh writing to prevent blotting.

Ammoccetes (am'mō-sē-tēz), n. [Gr. ammos, sand, and koitē, a bed.] A genus of cyclostomous fishes, family Petromyzonidæ or Petromyzidæ, closely allied to the lampreys. One British species is known, the pride or mud-lamprey (A. branchialis); it is occasionally met with in our rivers, where it lodges in the mud.

Ammodytes (am'mō-dī-tēz), n. [Gr. ammos, sand, and dytos, from dyō, to go into, to enter.] A genus of apodal fishes, family Ammodytidæ, sub-order Anacanthini; the sand-eel (which see).

Ammodytidæ (am'mō-dī''ti-dē), n. pl. [See AMMODYTES.] A family of fishes, sub-order Anacanthini, order Teleostei, of which the genus Ammodytes is the type. See SAND-EEL.

Ammon, from a bronze in British Museum.

Ammon (am'mon), n. [Anc. Egyptian Amun, Ammon.] An ancient Ethiopian, and subsequently an Egyptian deity, called by the Greeks Zeus Ammon, and by the Latins Jupiter Ammon. Alexander the Great visited his temple in the desert of Libya, and was saluted, it is said, by the priests as son of the god.

Ammonalum (am'mon-al-um), n. [Contr. for ammonia alum.] A mineral consisting of a hydrosulphate of alumina and ammonia, found in thin fibrous layers in brown-coal in Bohemia. In France it is manufactured and used for potash-alum.

Ammonia (am-mō'ni-a), n. [Gr. ammoniakon, sal-ammoniac, so called from the salt being first obtained by burning camels' dung near the Temple of Ammon in Libya.] (NH_3.) The modern name of the volatile alkali, formerly so called to distinguish it from the more fixed alkalies. It is a gas, and was first procured in that state by Priestley, who termed it alkaline air. He obtained it from sal-ammoniac by the action of lime, by which method it is yet generally prepared. Ammonia is used for many purposes, both in medicine and scientific chemistry; not, however, in the gaseous state, but frequently in solution in water, under the names of liquid ammonia, aqueous ammonia, or spirits of hartshorn. It may be liquefied by pressure, and the liquid may be frozen by the same means. It may be procured naturally from putrescent animal substances, and artificially from the destructive distillation of organic matter, except fat, by subjecting it to heat in iron cylinders. In commerce it is chiefly got from the distillation of pit-coal and of refuse animal substances, such as bones, clippings and shavings of horn, hoof, &c. It may also be obtained from vegetable matter when nitrogen is one of its elements. The air contains a minute quantity of ammonia from the putrefaction of animal and vegetable bodies. It is recognized by its pungent smell and transient alkaline effect on vegetable colours.

Ammoniac, Ammoniacal (am-mō'ni-ak, am-mō-nī'ak-al), a. Pertaining to ammonia, or possessing its properties.—Ammoniacal gas, ammonia in its purest form. See AMMONIA.—Ammoniac gum, or gum-ammoniac, a gum-resin from Africa and the East, brought in large masses, composed of tears, internally white and externally yellow; an exudation from an umbelliferous plant, the Dorema ammoniacum. It has a fetid smell, and a nauseous sweet taste, followed by a bitter one. It is inflammable, soluble in water and spirit of wine, and is used in medicine as an antispasmodic, stimulant, and expectorant in chronic catarrh, bronchitic affections, and asthma. It is also used for plasters.—Ammoniacal liquor, a product of the distillation of coal in gasworks, usually containing 4 to 8 oz. of ammonia in a gallon, and used as a manure.—Ammoniacal salt, a salt formed by the union of ammonia with an acid, without the elimination of hydrogen, differing in this from metallic salts, which are formed by the substitution of the metal for the hydrogen of the acid.

Ammoniac, Ammoniacum (am-mō'ni-ak, am-mō-nī'ak-um), n. Same as Ammoniac Gum (which see under AMMONIAC, a.)

Ammoniaphone (am-mō'ni-a-fōn), n. [Ammonia, and Gr. phōnē, voice.] A recently-invented contrivance for the inhalation of ammonia, a proceeding which is said to strengthen the voice, making it full, rich, and clear; suggested by the presence of ammonia in the atmosphere of Italy.

Ammonite (am'mon-īt), n. [Resembling the horns of Jupiter Ammon, whose statues were represented with ram's horns.] One of the fossil shells of an extensive genus (Ammonites) of extinct cephalopodous molluscs (cuttle-fishes), family Ammonitidæ, coiled in a plane spiral, and chambered within like that of the existing nautilus, to which the ammonites were allied. These shells have a nacreous lining in the inside, and a porcelaneous layer externally, and are smooth or rugose, the ridges straight, crooked, or undulated, and in some cases armed with projecting spines or tubercles. The species already described number 500, and range from the lias to the chalk inclusive. They vary in size from mere specks up to 3 or 4 feet in diameter. Sometimes called Snake-stone, and formerly Cornu Ammonis (Ammon's horn).

Ammonites obtusus.

Ammonites varians.

Ammonitidæ (am-mon-it'i-dē), n. pl. A numerous extinct family of tetrabranchiate cephalopods (cuttle-fishes), of which the well-known ammonite is the type. It includes the genera Goniatites, Ceratites, Ammonites, Scaphites, Hamites, and others. They are the most characteristic molluscs of the secondary rocks. See AMMONITE.

Ammonitiferous (am'mon-it-if''ér-us), a. Containing the remains of ammonites; as, ammonitiferous rocks.

Ammonium (am-mō'ni-um), n. (NH_4.) A name given to the hypothetical base of ammonia, analogous to a metal, as potassium. It has not been isolated. If mercury at the negative pole of a galvanic battery be placed in contact with a solution of ammonia, and the circuit be completed, an amalgam is formed which, at the temperature of 70° or 80° Fahr., is of the consistence of butter, but at the freezing-point is a firm and crystallized mass. This amalgam is supposed to be formed by the metallic base ammonium, and is the nearest approach to its isolation. On the ceasing of the current the amalgam decomposes into mercury, ammonia, and hydrogen, the two latter escaping as gas in the proportions expressed by their atomic weights, namely, H and NH_3.—Ammonium bases, compounds representing one or more molecules of hydrate of ammonium, in which mono- or poly-atomic radicals replace the whole or part of the hydrogen, as iodide of tetrethylium $N.(C_2H_5)_4I$.

Ammoniuret† (am-mon-ī'ū-ret), n. In chem. one of certain supposed compounds of ammonia and a pure metal, or an oxide of a metal.

Ammophila (a-mof'i-la), n. [Gr. ammos, sand, and philos, a lover.] 1. A genus of grasses growing on the sandy shores of Europe and North America; the sea-reed. A. arundinacea (common marum, sea-reed, mat-weed, or sea-bent) grows on sandy seashores, and is extensively employed in Norfolk and Holland for preserving the shores from inroads of the sea, as it serves to bind down the sand by its long matted rhizomes. It is also manufactured into door-mats and floor-brushes. In the Hebrides it is made into ropes, mats, bags, and hats.—2. A long-bodied genus of fossorial hymenoptera, commonly called sand-wasps. See SAND-WASP.

Ammunition (am-mū-ni'shon), n. [L. ad, and munitio, from munio, to fortify.] Military stores or provisions for attack or defence. In modern usage the signification is confined to the articles which are used in the discharge of firearms and ordnance of all kinds, as powder, balls, bombs, various kinds of shot, &c.—Ammunition bread, shoes, stockings, &c., in America such as are contracted for by government, and distributed to the private soldiers.

Ammunition-chest (am-mū-ni'shon-chest), n. A chest or box in which the fixed ammunition for field cannon is packed. One is carried on the limber of the gun-carriage, and one on the limber and two on the body of each caisson.

Amnesia (am-nē'si-a), n. [Gr. a, priv., and mnēsis, memory.] In med. loss of memory.

Amnesty (am'nes-ti), n. [L. amnestia, from Gr. amnēstia, oblivion—a, not, and root mna, to remember.] An act of oblivion; a general pardon of the offences of subjects against the government, or the proclamation of such pardon.

He had already given his consent to an act by which an amnesty was granted to all those who during the late troubles had been guilty of political offences. Macaulay.

Amnesty (am'nes-ti), v. t. To grant an amnesty to; to pardon.

In this case the government were asked to amnesty men who had committed some of the worst crimes that could be committed. Scotsman newspaper.

Amnion (am'ni-on), n. [Gr. amnion, the membrane round the fetus.] 1. The innermost membrane surrounding the fetus of mammals, birds, and reptiles. It is thin, transparent, soft, and smooth on the inside, but rough on the outside: it grows out from the free margins of the blastoderm, which ultimately meet in the middle line of the belly.—2. In bot. a thin, semi-transparent, gelatinous fluid, in which the embryo of a seed is suspended when it first appears, and by which the embryo is supposed to be nourished in its early stages.

Amnios (am'ni-os), n. Same as Amnion.

Amniotic (am-ni-ot'ik), a. 1. Pertaining to the amnion; contained in the amnion; as, the amniotic fluid.—2. A term applied to those groups of vertebrates (reptiles, birds, mammals) of which the fetus possesses an amnion.—Amniotic acid. See Allantoic Acid under ALLANTOIC.—Amniotic liquid, or liquor amnii, the liquid in which the fetus floats suspended by the umbilical cord.

Amœba (a-mē'ba), n. [Gr. amoibē, change.] A microscopic genus of rhizopodous Protozoa, of which A. diffluens, common in all our fresh-water ponds and ditches, is the type. It exists as a mass of protoplasm, which, when placed under the microscope, exhibits curious movements. It pushes its body out into finger-like processes or pseudopodia, and by means of these moves about or grasps particles of food. These processes may be protruded from any portion of the body, and are freely pushed out and as freely withdrawn again, or merged with the general protoplasmic matter of the body. From thus continually altering its shape it received its former name of proteus-animalcule. Within the body a nucleus and nucleolus are usually perceived, and certain clear spaces, termed contractile vesicles, from their exhibiting rhythmical movements of contraction and dilation, may also be noticed. The protoplasm of the amœba's body is differentiated into layers, the outer and firmer layer being termed the ectosarc, the inner and more fluid the endosarc. There is no distinct mouth, and food seized by means of the pseudopodia is engulfed within the soft sarcode body and by any portion of its surface, the apertures by which the food is taken in closing up immediately after reception of the nutriment. A clear space forms round each food particle after it has been received into the body, and the particle, if digestible, is slowly dissolved, the clear space left for a short time after digestion being termed a vacuole. Reproduction takes place in several ways; as, by fission, whereby an amœba simply divides into two portions, each of which becomes a distinct animalcule; or by a single pseudopodium detaching itself from the parent body, and developing into a separate amœba. Several other species have been described.

Amœba, or Fresh-water Proteus, showing some of the shapes which it assumes, and the vacuoles in its sarcodic substance.

Amœbæum (am-ē-bē'um), n. [L. amœbæum (carmen), from Gr. amoibaios, alternate, from ameibō, change, an answer, from ameibō, to change.] A poem in which persons are represented as speaking alternately, as in the third and seventh eclogues of Virgil.

Amœbea (am-ē-bē'a), n. pl. An order of Rhizopoda, of which the genus Amœba is the type. See AMŒBA.

Amœbean (am-ē-bē'an), a. [See AMŒBÆUM.] Alternately answering or responsive. 'Amœbean verses and the custom of vying . . . by turns.' J. Warton.

Amœbean (am-ē-bē'an), a. Of or relating to the order Amœbea.

Amœboid (a-mē'boid), a. [Amœba (which see), and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] Of or pertaining to or resembling the amœba; as, amœboid masses.

Amœbous (a-mē'bus), a. Of or relating to the genus Amœba; resembling the amœba in structure.

Amok (a-mok'), n. Same as Amuck.

Amolition † (am-o-li'shon), n. [L. amolitio, amolitionis, from amolior, to remove—a, from, and molior, to move.] A putting away; removal.

Amomum (a-mō'mum), n. [Gr. amōmon; Ar. hamauma, from hamma, to warm or heat; the heating plant.] A genus of plants, nat. order Zingiberaceæ, all natives of warm climates, and remarkable for the pungency and aromatic properties of their seeds. Various species yield cardamoms and grains of paradise (which see). Some have been introduced into our hothouses as ornamental plants because of their handsome flowers.

Amoneste,† v.t. To admonish; to advise. Chaucer.

Among, Amongst (a-mung', a-mungst'), prep. [A.Sax. amang, onmang, gemang, from mengan, to mingle; O.E. amonge, amonges, amongest, the es being an adverbial genitive termination, and the t tacked on. Comp. amidst. See MINGLE.] 1. Mixed or mingled with; in or into the midst of; in or into the number of; as, tares among wheat.

> Blessed art thou among women. Luke i. 28.
> I always thought
> It was both impious and unnatural
> That such immanity and bloody strife
> Should reign among professors of one faith. Shak.

2. In the power of, or by the action of, all jointly, or one or other of the number; as, I know you have the purse among you.

> You have among you killed a sweet and innocent lady. Shak.

Amontillado (a-mon'til-ä''dō), n. [Sp.] A dry kind of sherry of a light colour, highly esteemed by connoisseurs.

Amorado † (am-o-rä'dō), n. [Sp. pp. of amorar, L. amo, to love; the word is similar to inamorata, inamorato.] A lover.

> Mark Antony was both a courageous soldier and a passionate amorado. Old tract.

Amorean (am-ō-rē'an), n. One of a sect of Gemaric doctors or commentators on the Jerusalem Talmud.

Amoret, Amorette (am'o-ret, am-o-ret'), n. [Fr. amourette, a love-intrigue; It. amoretto, a little love or cupid; dim. from L. amor, love, from amo, to love.] 1. A trifling love affair; a slight amour.—2. A lover; a person enamoured.

> When amorets no more can shine,
> And Stella own she's not divine. T. Warton.

3. A love-knot.—4. A love-song or love-sonnet. 'His amorets and his canzonets, his pastorals and his madrigals to his Phyllis and his Amaryllis.' Heywood.

Amoretto (am-o-ret'to), n. A person enamoured; a lover.

> The amoretto was wont to take his stand at one place where sat his mistress. Gayton.

Amorevolous † (am-o-rev'o-lus), a. [L. amor, love, and volo, to wish.] Full of love or benevolence; kind; charitable.

> He would leave it to the Princesse to show her cordial and amorevolous affection. Bp. Hacket.

Amorist (am'o-rist), n. [L. amor, love.] A lover; a gallant; an inamorato. 'The pen of some vulgar amorist.' Milton.

A-mornings (a-mor'ningz), adv. [Prefix a, on, and mornings, which here is probably the adverbial genitive, not the plural.] In the mornings.

> Such pleasant walks into the woods
> A-mornings. Beau. & Fl.

Amorosa (am-ō-rō'sa), n. [It.] An amorous or wanton woman.

> I took them for amorosas, and violators of the bounds of modesty. Sir T. Herbert.

Amoroso (am-ō-rō'sō), n. [It., from amor, love.] A man enamoured; a lover.

> It is a gibe which an heathen puts upon an amoroso, that wastes his whole time in dalliance upon his mistress, viz. that love is an idle man's business. Bp. Hacket.

Amoroso (am-ō-rō'ō), adv. [It.] In music, tenderly; amorously; in a manner expressive of love: resembling affetuoso, but somewhat bolder and more spirited.

Amorous (am'or-us), a. [Fr. amoureux, It. amoroso, L.L. amorosus, L. amor, love.] 1. Inclined to love; having a propensity to love, or to sexual enjoyment; loving; fond; as, an amorous disposition. 'So amorous is Nature of whatever she produces.' Dryden. 'Princes amorous of their chiefs.' Chapman. 2. In love; enamoured: usually with of, formerly sometimes with on.

> The am'rous master owned her potent eyes. Prior.
> Sure my brother is amorous on Hero. Shak.

3. Pertaining or relating to love; produced by love; indicating love. 'Amorous delight.' Milton. 'Amorous airs.' Waller.—SYN. Loving, fond, tender, passionate.

Amorously (am'or-us-li), adv. In an amorous manner; fondly; lovingly.

Amorousness (am'or-us-nes), n. The quality of being amorous or inclined to love, or to sexual pleasure; fondness; lovingness.

Amorpha (a-mor'fa), n. [Gr. a, neg., and morphē, form.] A genus of plants, nat. order Leguminosæ; bastard indigo. The species are shrubs of moderate size, having pendulous branches and long clusters of blue-violet flowers. They are natives of America. A. fruticosa, the commonest species in European gardens, was introduced into Britain in 1724. The inhabitants of Carolina are said at one time to have made a coarse sort of indigo from its young shoots.

Amorphism (a-mor'fizm), n. State of being amorphous or without shape; specifically, a state of being without crystallization, even in the minutest particles, as in glass, opal, &c.

Amorphotæ (a-mor-fō'tē), n. pl. [Gr. amorphōtos, formless—a, without, and morphē, shape.] In astron. stars not formed into any constellation, and so not constituting a portion of any symmetrical figure.

Amorphous (a-mor'fus), a. [Gr. amorphos—a, neg., and morphē, form.] 1. Having no determinate form; of irregular shape. Kirwan.—2. Having no regular structure; specifically, being without crystallization, even in the minutest particles, as, glass and opal are amorphous.—3. Of no particular kind or character; formless; characterless; clumsy.

> Scientific treatises . . . are not seldom rude and amorphous in style. Hare.

Amorphozoa (a-mor'fō-zō''a), n. pl. [Gr. a, without, morphē, shape, and zōon, a living creature.] Lit. shapeless animals; specifically, a term applied to some of the lower groups of animals, as the sponges and their allies, which have no regular symmetrical structure. Blainville.

Amorphy (a-mor'fi), n. [See AMORPHOUS.] Irregularity of form; deviation from a determinate shape. 'His epidemical diseases being fastidiosity, amorphy, and oscitation.' Swift. [Rare.]

A-morrow † (a-mor'ō), adv. See A-MORWE.

Amort (a-mort'), a. A word used only in the phrase all amort=half-dead, depressed, spiritless, regardless. Nares thinks the phrase a corruption of a-la-mort, but it is more probably the adv. all and the Norm. amort, dead.

> How fares my Kate? What, sweeting, all amort! Shak.
> She danced along with vague, regardless eyes,
> . . . . . all amort. Keats.

Amortization, Amortizement (a-mor'tiz-ā''shon, a-mor'tiz-ment), n. [L.L. amortisatio, Fr. amortissement, mortmain.] 1. The act or right of alienating lands or tenements to a corporation in mortmain.—2. The extinction of debt, especially by a sinking fund.

Amortize (a-mor'tiz), v.t. pret. & pp. amortized; ppr. amortizing. [Norm. Fr. amortizer; L.L. amortisare, to sell in mortmain—L. ad, to, and mors, mortis, death. See MORTMAIN.] 1. In law, to alienate in mortmain, that is, to sell to a corporation, sole or aggregate, ecclesiastical or temporal, and their successors. See MORTMAIN.—2. To extinguish, as a debt, by means of a sinking fund.

A-morwe,† adv. On the morrow.

> A-morwe, when the day began to spring,
> Uprose our hoste. Canterbury Tales.

Amotion (a-mō'shon), n. [L. amotio, from amoveo, amotum. See AMOVE.] 1.† Removal; ejection.—2. In law, deprivation of possession or office; the removal of an officer or member of a corporation.

> The cause of his amotion is twice mentioned by the Oxford antiquary. T. Warton.

Amount (a-mount'), v.i. [O.Fr. amonter, to advance, ascend, increase; Norm. Fr. amont, upwards, up the stream—a, to, and monter, to mount, from mont, L. mons, montis, a hill. Comp. avale, from L. ad, to, and vallis, a valley.] 1.† To get up; ascend; and hence, to depart. 'When the larke doth fyrst amounte on high.' H. Peacham.

> So up he rose, and thence amounted straight. Spenser.

2. To reach a certain amount by an accumulation of particulars; to come in the aggregate or whole.

> Thy substance, valued at the highest rate,
> Cannot amount unto a hundred marks. Shak.

3. To rise, reach, or extend, in effect, substance, influence, or the like; to be equivalent.

> The errors of young men are the ruin of business; but the errors of aged men amount but to this, that more might have been done or sooner. Bacon.

[Swift joins the pp. of this verb with was, giving it the appearance of a transitive verb. 'Whose number was now amounted to 300.']

Amount (a-mount'), n. 1. The sum total of two or more particular sums or quantities; the aggregate; as, the amount of 7 and 9 is 16.—2. The effect, substance, or result; the sum; as, the evidence, in amount, comes to this.

Amour (a-mör'), n. [Fr., from L. amor, love.] An unlawful connection in love; a love intrigue; an affair of gallantry.—Amour propre, self-love; self-conceit; vanity.

Amourette (am-or-et'), n. Same as Amoret.

Amoval † (a-möv'al), n. Total removal. 'Amoval of insufferable nuisances.' Evelyn.

Amove (a-möv'), v.t. [L. amoveo—a, away, and moveo, to move.] 1. In law, to remove, especially from a post or station.

> Coroners may be amoved for reasonable cause. Sir M. Hale.

2.† To move; to excite; to affect.

> At her so piteous cry was much amoved
> Her champion stout. Spenser.

Ampac (am'pak), n. An East Indian tree, which yields a highly odoriferous resin, and the leaves of which are used to medicate baths. It is a species of Xanthoxylon.

Ampelidæ (am-pel'i-dē), n. pl. [See AMPELIS.] The chatterers, a family of insessorial or perching birds, having a wide gape, short broad and slightly arched bill, notched at the tip, and sharp hooked claws. Most of them inhabit tropical America, and several are distinguished for the gorgeousness of their plumage.

Ampelideæ (am-pel-id'ē-ē), n. pl. [From Gr. ampelis, ampelos, a vine.] The name given by Endlicher to the natural order of plants called Vitaceæ (which see).

Ampelinæ (am-pel-ī'nē), n. pl. A sub-family of birds of the family Ampelidæ or chatterers. See AMPELIDÆ, AMPELIS.

Ampelis (am'pel-is), n. [Gr., a kind of singing bird.] A genus of perching birds, forming the type of the family Ampelidæ or chatterers, as well as of the sub-family or group Ampelinæ. This genus includes the Bohemian wax-wing or waxen chatterer, the only chatterer that visits Britain.

Ampelite (am'pel-īt), n. [Gr. ampelitis, a kind of earth with which the vine was sprinkled to preserve it from worms—ampelos, a vine.] A species of black earth abounding in pyrites, so named from having been used to kill insects in vines. The name is also applied to cannel-coal and to some kinds of schist.

Ampelopsis (am-pel-op'sis), n. [Gr. ampelos, a vine, and opsis, appearance, resemblance.] A genus of plants, nat. order Vitaceæ, scarcely distinguishable from Vitis, except that the flowers have a ring round the base of the ovary. A. hederacea is the Virginian creeper, a well-known climbing shrub.

Ampere (am-pār'), n. [From the French electrician André Marie Ampère.] The unit employed in measuring the strength of an electric current.—Ampère's Theory, a theory referring the mutual attraction and repulsion of two magnets to the mutual action of electric currents circulating parallel to each other and in the same direction round the magnets. Ampère conceived that the magnetic action of the earth is the result of currents circulating within it, or at its surface, from east to west, in planes parallel to the magnetic equator.

Ampersand (am'pėr-sand), n. [E. and, L. per se, E. and—lit. and by itself and.] A term applied to the character &, which is formed by combining the letters of the Latin et, and: the expression is, or was, common in nursery-books.

Amphi- (am'fi). [A Greek preposition meaning about, on both sides, &c., allied to L. amb-, ambo, both, and to A. Sax. ymb, emb, Icel. G. um, round, about.] A prefix in words of Greek origin, signifying about, around, on both sides, in two respects, &c.

Amphiarthrosis (am'fi-ar-thrō"sis), n. [Gr. amphi, and arthrōsis, articulation.] In anat. a mixed kind of articulation, in which the articular surfaces of bones are united by an intermediate substance in a manner which admits of a small degree of motion: the articulation of the vertebræ furnishes an example.

Amphibia (am-fib'i-a), n. pl. [Gr. amphibios, living a double life—amphi, both, and bios, life.] In zool. a term meaning properly animals capable of living both under water and on land. Its use, therefore, ought to be restricted to such as have both lungs and gills simultaneously. Four genera of batrachians do possess such a double respiratory apparatus, the axolotls, Menobranchi, sirens (all of which inhabit the rivers and lakes of America), and the proteus, which is found in subterranean rivers in Illyria. These are the only known vertebrated animals which are truly amphibious. By most naturalists, however, the term is extended so as to include all animals which possess both gills and lungs, whether at different stages of their existence or simultaneously. By this classification not only the above four genera, but such batrachians as frogs, Amphiuma, &c., which breathe by gills during the tadpole state, and by lungs in their more mature and perfect form, are included. In popular lan. otters, seals, walruses, crocodiles, and other animals inhabiting or frequenting water, are often called amphibious, though none of them can breathe under water.

Amphibial, Amphibian (am-fib'i-al, am-fib'i-an), a. Of or pertaining to the Amphibia; having the power of living in air and water. See AMPHIBIOUS.

Amphibial, Amphibian (am-fib'i-al, am-fib'i-an), n. One of the Amphibia.

Amphibiolite (am-fib'i-o-līt), n. [Gr. amphibios, amphibious, and lithos, stone.] A fossil amphibious animal.

Amphibiological (am-fib'i-o-loj"ik-al), a. Pertaining to amphibiology.

Amphibiology (am-fib'i-ol"o-ji), n. [Gr. amphibia, and logos, discourse.] A discourse or treatise on amphibious animals, or the history and description of such animals; the department of natural history which treats of the Amphibia.

Amphibious (am-fib'i-us), a. [See AMPHIBIA.] 1. A term applied to animals which have the power of living in two elements, air and water, from possessing a double respiratory apparatus, either simultaneously, as in the case of axolotls, sirens, &c., or at different stages of their existence, as in the case of frogs: applied in popular usage to any lung-breathing animal which can exist for a considerable time under water, as the crocodile, whale, seal, beaver, &c.—2. Adapted for living on land or water.

> The amphibious character of the Greeks was already determined; they were to be lords of land and sea. Hare.

3. Of a mixed nature; partaking of two natures; as, an amphibious breed. [Colloq.]

> Not in free and common socage, but in this amphibious subordinate class of villein socage. Blackstone.

Amphibiousness (am-fib'i-us-nes), n. The quality of being amphibious; ability to live in two elements; the quality of partaking of two natures.

Amphibium (am-fib'i-um), n. An amphibious animal. See AMPHIBIA.

Amphibole (am'fi-bōl), n. [Gr. amphibolos, equivocal, doubtful.] A name given by Haüy and some other mineralogists to hornblende, from its resemblance to augite, for which it may readily be mistaken.

Amphibolic (am-fi-bol'ik), a. Pertaining to or resembling amphibole, or partaking of its nature and character.

Amphibolite (am-fib'o-līt), n. [Amphibole (which see).] In mineral. a rock with a base of amphibole or hornblende; trap, or greenstone.

Amphibological (am-fib'o-loj"ik-al), a. Of or pertaining to amphibology; of doubtful meaning; ambiguous. 'Doubtful or amphibological expressions.' Jer. Taylor.

Amphibologically (am-fib'o-loj"ik-al-li), adv. With a doubtful meaning.

Amphibology (am-fi-bol'o-ji), n. [Gr. amphibologia—amphi, in two ways, ballō, to throw, and logos, discourse.] A phrase or discourse susceptible of two interpretations; and hence, a phrase of uncertain meaning. We have an example of amphibology in the answer of the oracle to Pyrrhus: 'Aio te Romanos vincere posse.' Here te and Romanos may either of them precede or follow vincere posse, and the sense may be either, you may conquer the Romans, or the Romans may conquer you. The English language seldom admits of amphibology. For an English example see extract under AMPHIBOLOUS.

Amphiboloid (am-fib'ol-oid), n. A rock composed of amphibole (hornblende) and felspar, in which the amphibole predominates; a variety of greenstone.

Amphibolous (am-fib'ol-us), a. [Gr. amphibolos—amphi, and ballō, to strike.] Ambiguous; equivocal. [Rare.]

> Never was there such an amphibolous quarrel—both parties declaring themselves for the king. Howell.

Now used only in logic as applied to a sentence susceptible of two meanings.

> An amphibolous sentence is one that is capable of two meanings, not from the double sense of any of the words, but from its admitting a double construction; as, . . . 'The duke yet lives that Henry shall depose.' Whately.

Amphiboly (am-fib'o-li), n. [Gr. amphibolia—amphi, both ways, and ballō, to strike.] Ambiguity of meaning. [Rare.]

Amphibrach, Amphibrachys (am'fi-brak, am-fib'ra-kis), n. [Gr. amphi, on both sides, and brachys, short.] In pros. a foot of three syllables, the middle one long, the first and last short; as, hăbĕrĕ, in Latin.

Amphicarpic, Amphicarpous (am-fi-kär'pik, am-fi-kär'pus), a. [Gr. amphi, in two ways, two, and karpos, fruit.] In bot. possessing two kinds of fruit, either in respect of form or time of ripening.

Amphicentrum (am-fi-sen'trum), n. [Gr. amphi, on both sides, and kentron, a spine.] A genus of fossil ganoid fishes wanting abdominal fins. The dorsal and ventral margins project like spines. They are confined to carboniferous strata.

Amphicœlous, Amphicœlian (am-fi-sē'lus, am-fi-sē'li-an), a. [Gr. amphi, at both ends, and koilos, hollow.] In physiol. applied to vertebræ which are doubly concave or hollow at both ends, as in fish and one group of extinct Crocodilia.

Amphicome (am'fi-kōm), n. [Gr. amphi, around, and komē, hair.] A kind of figured stone of a round shape, but rugged and beset with eminences, anciently used in divination. Ency. Brit.

Amphictyonic (am-fik'ti-on"ik), a. Pertaining to the august council or league of Amphictyons.

Amphictyons (am-fik'ti-onz), n. pl. [Gr. amphiktyones = dwellers around, neighbours.] In Grecian antiq. an assembly or council of deputies from the different states of Greece. Ten or twelve states were represented in this assembly, which sat alternately at Thermopylæ and at Delphi.

Amphictyony (am-fik'ti-on-i), n. The Amphictyonic League or Council, an association of several neighbouring states of ancient Greece, for the furtherance of the general interests.

Amphicyon (am-fis'i-on), n. [Gr. amphi, implying doubt, and kyōn, a dog.] A large fossil carnivorous quadruped, so called from its teeth, which combine the characters of those of the dogs (Canidæ) and bears (Ursidæ). It occurs principally in the miocene tertiary formation.

Amphid, Amphide (am'fid), n. [Gr. amphi, in two ways, and eidos, form, appearance.] A term given by Berzelius to compounds consisting of two sulphides, oxides, selenides, or tellurides, and therefore containing three different elements, as distinguished from haloid compounds. See HALOID.

Amphidisc (am'fi-disk), n. [Gr. amphi, at both ends, and diskos, a quoit, a round plate.] In zool. one of the spicules which surround the reproductive gemmules of Spongilla, resembling two toothed wheels united by an axle.

Amphidromical (am-fi-drom'ik-al), a. [Gr. amphi, around, and dromikos, good at running.] Of or pertaining to the ancient Greek festival amphidromia, celebrated when a child received its name, and so termed from the infant being carried round the hearth preparatory to being named. Sir T. Browne.

Amphidura (am-fi-dū'ra), n. [A corruption of amphithura (which see).] In the Greek Ch. the veil or curtain opening to the dwarf folding doors, and separating the chancel from the rest of the church. It corresponds to the cancellus of Roman Catholic churches.

Amphidura, from Greek Church, London Wall.

When the priest has passed through the folding doors the curtain is drawn across, so that whilst officiating at the altar he is hidden from the congregation. Several times during the service the curtain is drawn back to allow the priest to come forward and read certain portions of the services outside the folding doors.

Amphigamous (am-fig'a-mus), a. [Gr. amphi, implying doubt, and gamos, nuptials.] In bot. a term formerly used as synonymous with cryptogamous.

Amphigastria (am-fi-gas'tri-a), n. pl. [Gr. amphi, around, and gastēr, stomach.] The imperfect leaves or so-called stipules on the under or shaded side of the axis of the scale-mosses or Jungermanniaceæ.

Amphigean (am-fi-jē'an), a. [Gr. amphi, around, and gē, the earth.] Extending over all the zones of the globe, from the tropic to either polar inclusive. Dana.

Amphigen (am'fi-jen), n. [Gr. amphi, around, and gennaō, to produce, from ginomai, to be formed.] A plant which has no distinct axis, but increases by the growth or development of its cellular tissue on all sides, as the lichens.

Amphigene (am'fi-jēn), n. In mineral. another name for leucite (which see).

Amphigenous (am-fij'e-nus), a. A term applied to fungi when the hymenium is not restricted to a particular surface.

Amphihexahedral (am-fi-heks'a-hē"dral), a. [Gr. amphi and E. hexahedral.] In crystal. said of a crystal in which the faces, counted in two different directions, give two hexahedral outlines, or are found to be six in number.

Amphilogy (am-fil'o-ji), n. [Gr. amphi, in two ways, and logos, discourse.] Equivocation; amphibology.

Amphimacer (am-fim'a-sėr), n. [Gr. amphimakros, long on both sides.] In pros. a foot of three syllables, the middle one short and the others long, as in cāstĭtās: the opposite of an amphibrach.

Amphioxidæ, Amphioxini (am-fi-oks'i-dē, am'fi-oks-ī'ni), n. pl. The only family of pharyngo-branchial fishes, with gelatinous dorsal chord, pulsating vessels in place of the heart, and a branchial sac in the cavity of the œsophagus. The amphioxus is the type.

Amphioxus (am-fi-oks'us), n. [Gr. amphi, on both sides, and oxus, sharp, because the animal is sharp at both ends.] An anomalous genus of fishes, otherwise called Branchiostoma, and containing only the common lancelet (Amphioxus lanceolatus or Branchiostoma lanceolatum) and another species. See BRANCHIOSTOMA.

Amphipneust (am'fip-nūst), n. One of the amphipneusta (which see).

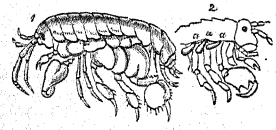
Amphipneusta (am-fip-nūs'ta), n. pl. [Gr. amphi, in two ways, and pneō, to breathe.] A former name of a sub-order of tailed amphibia, retaining their gills through life. See URODELA.

Amphipod, Amphipode (am'fi-pod, am'fi-pōd), n. One of the amphipoda (which see).

Amphipoda (am-fip'od-a), n. pl. [Gr. amphi, on both sides, and pous, podos, a foot.] An order of the sessile-eyed malacostracan crustaceans. The bodies of these animals are compressed laterally, and curved upon the sides; the eyes are immovable, and their feet are directed partly forwards and partly backwards. The respiratory organs consist of membranous vesicles attached to the bases of the thoracic limbs. Many of the species are found in springs and rivulets; others are met with in salt water. The sand-hopper and shore-jumper are examples.



Amphipoda.

1, Shore-jumper (Orchestia littoralis). 2, Portion of Orchestia to show the respiratory organs a a a.

Amphipodous (am-fip'od-us), a. Of or pertaining to the Amphipoda.

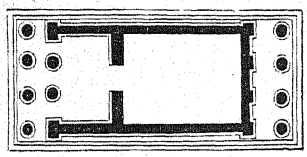
Amphiprostyle, Amphiprostile (am-fip'-ro-stīl), n. [Gr. amphi, on both sides, and prostylos, having pillars in front—pro, before, and stylē, a column.] Lit. having pillars both in front and behind. In arch. a structure having the form of an ancient Greek or Roman oblong rectangular temple, with a prostyle or portico on each of its ends or fronts, but with no columns on its sides or flanks.



Plan of Amphiprostyle Temple.

Amphisarca (am'fi-sär-ka), n. [Gr. amphi, on both sides, and sarx, sarkos, flesh.] In bot. a compound, many-celled, indehiscent, superior fruit, with a woody or indurated shell inclosing an internal pulp, as seen in the baobab.

Amphisbæna (am-fis-bē'na), n. [Gr. amphisbaina—amphis, on both sides, and bainō, to go, from the belief that the animal moved with either end foremost.] A genus of serpentiform, limbless reptiles, family Amphisbænidæ, order Lacertilia, with the head small, smooth, and blunt, the nostrils small, the eyes minute and blackish, and the mouth furnished with small teeth. The body is cylindrical, destitute of scales, and divided into numerous annular segments; the tail obtuse, and scarcely to be distinguished from the head, whence the belief that it moved equally well with either end foremost. There are several species. A. fuliginosa, black, with white spots, is found in Guinea and Surinam; and A. alba, the largest species, about 21 inches long, reddish-brown above and white below, is found in Surinam and Brazil, generally in ant-hillocks. They feed on ants and earthworms, and were formerly, but erroneously, deemed poisonous, whence Milton classes it among the most noxious reptiles.

> Complicated monsters . . .
> Scorpion, and asp, and amphisbæna dire,
> Cerastes horned, hydras, and elops drear,
> And dipsas. Paradise Lost, b. x.

Amphisbæna fuliginosa.

—Aquatic amphisbæna, a name formerly sometimes given to the common hair-worm (Gordius aquaticus), which, however, has no connection with the amphisbænas proper, but is one of the nematoid worms, or Nematelmia, class Scolecida. See GORDIUS and GORDIACEA.

Amphisbænia (am-fis-bē'ni-a), n. pl. An order of lacertian reptiles, of which the genus Amphisbæna is the type.

Amphisbænidæ (am-fis-bē'ni-dē), n. pl. That family of the Amphisbænia which includes the genus Amphisbæna.

Amphiscian (am-fish'i-an), n. One of the Amphiscii (which see).

Amphiscii (am-fish'i-ī), n. pl. [Gr. amphi, on both sides, and skia, shadow.] In geog. the inhabitants of the inter-tropical regions, whose shadows at noon in one part of the year are cast to the north and in the other to the south, according as the sun is in the southern or northern signs.

Amphisile (am-fis'i-lē), n. A genus of acanthopterygious fishes, in which the back is plated, and the first dorsal fin is placed quite at the extremity of the body, and produced into a long and strong spine. It belongs to the family Fistularidæ (Aulostomidæ), or sea-snipes. It is closely allied to, and was included in, the genus Centriscus by Linnæus.

Part of Amphisile strigata.

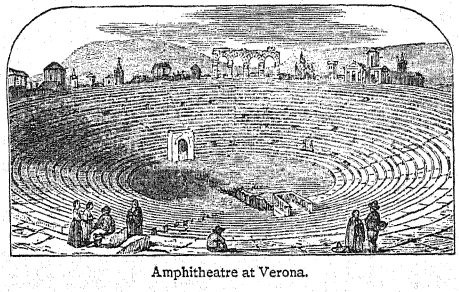
Amphistomous (am-fis'tom-us), a. [Gr. amphi, on both sides, and stoma, a mouth.] A term applied to certain entozoa having a cup-shaped mouth at each extremity, by which they adhere to the intestines of the animals in which they are parasitic.

Amphitheatral (am-fi-thē'a-tral), a. Pertaining to or resembling an amphitheatre.

Amphitheatre (am-fi-thē'a-tėr), n. [Gr. amphitheatron—amphi, about, and theatron, theatre, from theaomai, to see or look.] 1. An ancient Roman edifice of an oval form, having a central area encompassed with rows of seats, rising higher as they receded from the centre, on which people used to sit to view the combats of gladiators and of wild beasts, and other sports. The ancient theatre was nearly semicircular in shape, with its rows of seats fronting the stage; the amphitheatre is frequently described as a double theatre, as consisting of two such semicircles or halves joined together, the spaces allotted to their orchestras becoming the inner inclosure, area, or, as it was called, arena, from being generally covered with sand. It is not quite correct to say, however, that an amphitheatre was formed by two semicircles, since it was always elliptical in form. The arena was surrounded by a wall about 15 feet high, so that the spectators were quite secure from the attacks of any of the wild beasts exhibited. The Colosseum at Rome is the largest of all the ancient amphitheatres, being capable of containing from 50,000 to 80,000 persons. That at Verona is one of the best examples remaining. Its dimensions are 502 feet by 401, and 98 feet high.—2. Anything resembling an amphitheatre in form, as a hollow surrounded by rising ground; in hort. a sloping disposition of shrubs and trees.



Amphitheatre at Verona.

Amphitheatric, Amphitheatrical (am'fi-thē-at''rik, am'fi-thē-at''rik-al), a. Pertaining to or exhibited in an amphitheatre. 'Amphitheatrical gladiatures.' Gayton.

Amphitheatrically (am'fi-thē-at''rik-al-li), adv. In an amphitheatrical manner or form.

Amphitherium (am-fi-thē'ri-um), n. [Gr. amphi, implying doubt, and thērion, a wild beast.] A fossil insectivorous mammal of the oolite. As its remains do not furnish sufficient data to decide whether it is placental or aplacental, it has received this provisional name. A. Prevostii is the only species yet discovered.

Amphithura (am-fi-thū'ra), n. [Gr. amphi, both, twofold, and thura, a door.] The correct spelling of the word now commonly written Amphidura (which see).

Amphitrite (am-fi-trī'tē), n. [Name of a sea-nymph in Greek mythology, sister of Thetis and wife of Neptune.] 1. A small planet or asteroid between the orbits of Mars and Jupiter, discovered by M. Marth on the 2d March, 1854.—2. A genus of marine annelids, order Tubicolæ, and class Annulata of Cuvier. They are easily recognized by their golden-coloured setæ, disposed in the form of a crown. Some of them construct and carry about with them slight, regularly conical tubes of sand, glued together by mucus exuded from the skin.

Amphitropal, Amphitropous (am-fit'ropal, am-fit'rop-us), a. [Gr. amphi, round, and trepō, to turn.] In bot. applied to an ovule curved upon itself so that both ends (the foraminal and chalazal) are brought near to each other with the hilum in the middle.

Amphitropal Ovule.

Amphitype (am'fi-tīp), n. [Gr. amphi, both, and typos, an impression.] In photog. a process discovered by Sir John Herschel, by which light produces either a positive or a negative. The paper is prepared by a solution of ferro-tartrate or of ferro-citrate of protoxide or peroxide of mercury, followed by a solution of ammonio-tartrate or ammonio-citrate. On exposure in the camera a negative is produced of a rich brown tint, which fades in the dark, but may be restored as a black positive by immersing it in a solution of nitrate of mercury, and ironing it with a hot iron.

Amphiuma (am-fi-ū'ma), n. [Gr. amphi, both, and huma, from huō, to wet, to water.] A genus of amphibians which frequent the lakes and stagnant waters of North America. The adults retain the clefts at which the gills of the tadpole projected. The body is of great length.

Amphiumidæ (am-fi-ū'mi-dē), n. pl. A family of tailed amphibians distinguished by a small branchial aperture on each side, within which are the branchial arches with small laminæ. They approach, in respect of their respiratory apparatus, the amphipneusts or true amphibians, in which the external gills are persistent. The genus Amphiuma (which see) is the type.

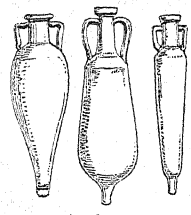
Amphora (am'fo-ra), n. pl. Amphoræ (am'fo-rē). [L. amphora, Gr. amphoreus, a shortened form of amphiphoreus—amphi, on both sides, and phoreō, to carry, from its two handles.] Among the Greeks and Romans, a vessel, usually tall and narrow, with two handles or ears and a narrow neck, and generally ending in a sharp point below for being inserted in a stand or in the ground, used for holding wine, oil, honey, and the like. The amphoræ were commonly made of earthenware, but Homer mentions amphoræ of gold and stone; the Egyptians had them of brass; and glass vessels of this form have been found at Pompeii. The most common use of the amphora was for keeping wine. The stopper was covered with pitch or gypsum, and, among the Romans, the title of the wine was painted on the outside, the date of the vintage being marked by the names of the consuls then in office. The amphora was also the name of a fixed measure, the Greek amphora being equal to 8 gallons, 7·365 pints imperial measure, and the Roman amphora two-thirds of this, or 5 gallons, 7·577 pints imperial. The amphora is often introduced in architecture as an ornament to sarcophagi, &c.



Amphoræ.

Amphoral (am'fō-ral), a. Pertaining to or resembling an amphora.

Amphoric (am-for'ik), a. In auscultation, emitted from a cavity in the lungs not filled with fluid, and so giving a sound like that produced by blowing into an empty decanter; as, amphoric resonance or respiration.

Amphoteric (am-fo-te'rik), a. [Gr. amphoteros, both.] Partly the one and partly the other. Smart.

Ample (am'pl), a. [Fr. ample, L. amplus—prefix am, amb (=Gr. amphi, on both sides), and root of pleo, to fill; comp. double.] 1. Large in dimensions; of great size, extent, capacity, or bulk; wide; spacious; extended; as, ample room. 'Nature's ample lap.' Thomson.

All the people in that ample house
Did to that image bow their humble knees.
Spenser.

2. Fully sufficient for any purpose or for some purpose intended; abundant; liberal; copious; plentiful; as, ample provision for the table; ample justice.

An ample number of horses had been purchased in England with the public money. Macaulay.

3. Not brief or contracted; extended; diffusive; as, an ample narrative. —Ample, Copious, Plenteous. Ample has reference to the sufficiency of the supply for every need; copious carries with it the idea of unfailingness of supply; while plenteous indicates largeness of quantity in actual possession; as, ample stores or resources; a copious supply of materials; a plenteous harvest.—SYN. Spacious, extensive, wide, capacious, abundant, plentiful, plenteous, liberal, copious, rich.

Amplectant (am-plek'tant), a. [L. amplectans, amplectantis, ppr. of amplector, to embrace.] Embracing; clasping; specifically, in bot. encircling or clasping the stem of a plant; as, amplectant tendrils.

Ampleness (am'pl-nes), n. The state of being ample; largeness; sufficiency; abundance.

Amplexation † (am-pleks-ā'shon), n. [L. amplexor, amplexatus, to embrace.] An embrace. 'An humble amplexation of those sacred feet.' Bp. Hall.

Amplexicaul (am-plek'si-kal), a. [L. amplexus, embracing—amb, about, and plecto, plexus, to twist—and caulis, a stem.] In bot. nearly surrounding or embracing the stem, as the base of a leaf. Papaver somniferum and Inula Helenium have amplexicaul leaves.

Amplexicaul Leaves (Inula Helenium).

Ampliate (am'pli-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. ampliated; ppr. ampliating. [L. amplio, ampliatum. See AMPLE.] To make more ample or greater; to enlarge; to extend. 'To maintain and ampliate the external possessions of your empire.' Udall.

Ampliation (am-pli-ā'shon), n. 1. Enlargement; amplification; diffuseness.

Odious matters admit not of an ampliation, but ought to be restrained and interpreted in the mildest sense. Ayliffe.

2. In Rom. antiq. a delaying to pass sentence; a postponement of a decision to obtain further evidence.

Ampliative (am'pli-āt-iv), a. Enlarging; increasing; specifically, in metaph. adding to what is involved in the meaning of the subject of a proposition; synthetic: said of judgments.

'All bodies possess power of attraction' is an ampliative judgment, because we can think of bodies without thinking of attraction as one of their immediate primary attributes. But, if our knowledge of any object were complete, we should conceive it invested with all its attributes, and no ampliative judgments would be required. Adp. Thomson.

Amplificate † (am-plif'i-kāt), v.t. [L. amplifico, amplificatum, to enlarge—amplus, wide, and facio, factum, to make.] To enlarge in dimensions; to amplify.

Amplification (am'pli-fi-kā"shon), n. 1. The act of amplifying or enlarging in dimensions; enlargement; extension. 'Amplification of the visible figure of a known object.' Reid. 2. In rhet. diffusive description or discussion; exaggerated representation; copious argument, intended to present the subject in every view or in the strongest light; diffuse narrative, or a dilating upon all the particulars of a subject; a description given in more words than are necessary, or an illustration by various examples and proofs.

Amplificative (am'pli-fi-kāt-iv), a. Serving or tending to amplify; amplificatory.

Amplificatory (am'pli-fi-kā-to-ri), a. Serving to amplify or enlarge; amplificative.

Amplifier (am'pli-fī-ėr), n. One who amplifies or enlarges. 'That great citie Rome, whereof they (Romulus and Remus) were the first amplifiers.' Bale.

There are amplifiers who can extend half a dozen thin thoughts over a whole folio. Pope.

Amplify (am'pli-fī), v.t. pret. & pp. amplified; ppr. amplifying. [Fr. amplifier, to enlarge—L. amplus, ample, and facio, to make.] 1. To make more ample, larger, more extended, fuller, more copious, and the like; to enlarge.

All concaves . . . do amplify the sound at the coming out. Bacon.

'Troilus and Cressida' was written by a Lombard author, but much amplified by our English translator. Dryden.

2. In rhet. to enlarge in discussion or by manner of representation; to treat copiously, so as to present the subject in every view, and in the strongest lights.

I would not willingly seem to flatter the present (age), by amplifying the diligence and true judgment of those servitours who have laboured in the vineyard. Sir J. Davies.

Amplify (am'pli-fī), v.i. 1. To grow or become ample or more ample.

Strait was the way at first, withouten light,
But further it did further amplify. Fairfax.

2. To enlarge by representation or description; to speak largely or copiously; to be diffuse in argument or description; to dilate upon: often followed by on; as, to amplify on the several topics of discourse.

Homer amplifies, not invents. Pope.

When you affect to amplify on the former branches of a discourse, you will often lay a necessity on yourself of contracting the latter. Watts.

Amplitude (am'pli-tūd), n. [L. amplitudo, from amplus, large.] 1. State of being ample; as, (a) largeness of dimensions; extent of surface or space; as, the amplitude of the earth.

The cathedral of Lincoln . . . is a magnificent structure, proportionable to the amplitude of the diocese. Fuller.

(b) Largeness, in a figurative sense; as, extent of capacity or intellectual powers; extent of means or resources. 'Amplitude of mind.' Milton.

It is in the power of princes and estates to add amplitude and greatness to their kingdoms. Bacon.

2. In astron. an arc of the horizon intercepted between the east or west point and the centre of the sun or star at its rising or setting. At the rising of a star the amplitude is eastern or ortive; at the setting it is western, occiduous, or occasive. It is also northern or southern when north or south of the equator. The amplitude of a fixed star remains nearly the same all the year round. The sun at the solstices is at its maximum amplitude, and at the equator it has no amplitude. —Amplitude of the range of a projectile, the horizontal line subtending the path of a body thrown, or the line which measures the distance it has moved; the range.—Magnetical amplitude, the arc of the horizon between the sun or a star at rising or setting, and the east or west point of the horizon, by the compass. The difference between this and the true amplitude is the variation of the compass.—Amplitude compass, an azimuth compass, whose zeros of graduation are at the east and west points, for the more ready reading of the amplitudes of celestial bodies.

Amply (am'pli), adv. In an ample manner; largely; liberally; fully; sufficiently; copiously; abundantly.

Ampul (am'pul), n. See AMPULLA, 2.

Ampulla (am-pul'la), n. pl. Ampullæ (am-pul'lē). [L.] In Rom. antiq. a more or less globular bottle, usually made of glass or earthenware, rarely of more valuable materials, used for carrying oil to the bath for the purpose of anointing the body after bathing.—2. Eccles. (a) a flask or cruet, generally of precious metal, for holding the wine and water used at the altar. See AMA. (b) A vessel for holding the consecrated oil or chrism used in various church rites and at the coronation of kings. The ampulla used at coronations in England is in the form of an eagle, of pure gold, richly chased. The famous one formerly used in France was kept at Rheims, and was reputed to have been brought from heaven by a dove for the baptism of Clovis I. It was broken at the revolution, but a fragment is said to have been preserved and used at the coronation of Charles X. Written also Ampul.—3. In anat. the dilated part of the membranaceous semicircular canals in the ear.—4. In bot. (a) a small membranaceous bag attached to the roots and the immersed leaves of some aquatic plants, as in the Lemna or duck-weed. (b) A term applied to the hollow flask-shaped leaves formed in certain aquatic plants, as in Utricularia (which see).

Ampullaceous (am-pul-lā'shus), a. Of or pertaining to or like an ampulla, bottle, or inflated bladder.

Amputate (am'pū-tāt), v.t. pret. & pp. amputated; ppr. amputating. [L. amputo, amputatum—amb, about, and puto, to prune.] 1. To prune, as branches of trees or vines. 2. To cut off, as a limb or other part of an animal body.

Amputation (am-pū-tā'shon), n. [L. amputatio.] The act of amputating; especially, the operation of cutting off a limb or other projecting part of the body.

Ampyx (am'piks), n. [Gr., a fillet for tying back the hair in front, from ampechō, to encircle.] 1. In Greek antiq. (a) a broad band or plate of metal, often enriched with precious stones, worn on the forehead by ladies of rank. (b) The head-band of a horse.—2. A species of trilobite or fossil crustacean, found chiefly in lower Silurian strata.

Ampyx.

Amsel (am'sel), n. Same as Amzel (which see).

Amuck (a-muk'), n. [Malay or Javanese amŭk.] A term used in the Eastern Archipelago in the sense of slaughter or kill, being employed especially among the Malays by such of them as are occasionally seen to rush out in a frantic state (probably caused by opium or some other drug) with daggers in their hands, yelling 'Amuck, amuck,' attacking all that come in their way: whence the common expression to run amuck, to rush about frantically, attacking all that come in the way; to attack all and sundry.

Satire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet
To run amuck and tilt at all I meet. Pope.

Amule (am'ūl), n. Same as Amyl.

Amulet (am'ū-let), n. [L. amuletum, Fr. amulette, Sp. amuleto, an amulet; amuletum in Latin was a borrowed word, and the same as Ar. hamālat, anything worn, from hamala, to carry, to wear.] Something worn as a remedy or preservative against evils or mischief, such as diseases and witchcraft. Amulets have been used from ancient times, and are still worn in many parts of the world. They consisted of certain stones, metals, or plants; sometimes of mystic words, characters, or sentences arranged in a particular order. The early Christian amulets were commonly inscribed with the word ichthys, fish, or with the shape of a fish, because this represented the initials of the Greek words for Jesus Christ, Son of God, Saviour. They were suspended from the neck, or affixed to the body.

Amulets, from Vatican (1), and private collection (2).

Amuletic (am-ū-let'ik), a. Pertaining to an amulet.

Amun (a-mun), n. Same as Aghanee (which see).

Amurcosity † (a-mėr-kos'i-ti), n. The quality of being amurcous. Bailey.

Amurcous † (a-mėr'kus), a. [L. amurca, the dregs or lees of olives.] Full of dregs or lees; foul. Ash.

Amusable (a-mūz'a-bl), a. Capable of being amused.

Amuse (a-mūz'), v.t. pret. & pp. amused; ppr. amusing. [Fr. amuser, to amuse, to divert, to hold in play—a, to, and O.Fr. muser, to muse, whence musard, a loiterer. See MUSE.] 1.† To cause to muse; to absorb or engage in meditation; to occupy or engage wholly.

People stood amused between these two forms of service. Fuller.

Camillus set upon the Gauls when they were amused in receiving their gold. Holland.

2. To entertain the mind of agreeably; to occupy or detain the attention of in a pleasant manner or with agreeable objects. 'A group of mountaineer children amusing themselves with pushing stones from the top.' W. Gilpin.—3. To keep in expectation, as by flattery, plausible pretences, and the like; to delude; to keep in play.

He amused his followers with idle promises. Johnson.

Bishop Henry . . . amused her with dubious answers, and kept her in suspense for some days. Swift.

—Amuse, Divert, Entertain. Amuse is to occupy one's time and attention lightly and pleasantly; divert, lit. to turn aside; to turn the attention to some lighter subject than a previous one, generally to something absolutely lively or sportive; entertain, to engage the attention by the pleasing nature of the object of attraction; to keep one in a continuous state of interest, implying a certain activity if it is a person that entertains. Trifles that amuse children may divert grown-up people; while we may be entertained by a book, concert, lecture, &c.—SYN. To entertain, gratify, please, divert, beguile, deceive, occupy.

Amuse † (a-mūz'), v.i. To muse; to meditate.

Or in some pathless wilderness amusing,
Plucking the mossy bark of some old tree. Lee.

Amusement (a-mūz'ment), n. 1.† Deep thought; meditation.

Here I . . . fell into a strong and deep amusement, revolving in my mind, with great perplexity, the amazing change of our affairs. Bp. Fleetwood.

2. The state of being amused; a slight amount of mirth or tendency towards merriment; as, I could not conceal my amusement at his pranks.—3. That which amuses, detains, or engages the mind; pastime.

During his confinement, his amusement was to give poison to cats and dogs, and see them expire by slower or quicker torments. Pope.

SYN. Diversion, entertainment, recreation, pastime, sport.

Amuser (a-mūz'ėr), n. One who amuses.

Amusing (a-mūz'ing), p. and a. Giving moderate pleasure to the mind, so as to engage it; pleasing; diverting; as, an amusing story.

Amusingly (a-mūz'ing-li), adv. In an amusing manner.

Amusive (a-mū'ziv), a. Having power to amuse or entertain the mind. [Rare.]

Amusive birds! say where your hid retreat
When the frost rages and the tempests beat.
Gilbert White.

Amusively (a-mū'ziv-li), adv. In an amusive manner.

Amyelous (a-mī'el-us), a. [Gr. a, priv., and myelos, marrow.] In med. a term applied to the fetus in cases in which there is complete absence of the spinal marrow.

Amyencephalous (a-mī'en-sef''al-us), a. [Gr. a, priv., myelos, marrow, and encephalon, (which see).] In med. applied to a fetus in which both spinal marrow and encephalon are wanting.

Amygdalate (a-mig'da-lāt), a. [L. amygdalus, an almond.] Pertaining to, resembling, or made of almonds.

Amygdalate (a-mig'da-lāt), n. 1. An emulsion made of almonds; milk of almonds.—2. A salt of amygdalic acid.

Amygdalic (a-mig-dal'ik), a. Obtained from almonds; as, amygdalic acid ($C_{20}H_{22}O_{12}$), an acid obtained from bitter almonds.

Amygdalin, Amygdaline (a-mig'da-lin), n. ($C_{20}H_{27}NO_{11}+3\,H_2O$.) A crystalline principle existing in bitter almonds, the leaves of the common laurel, and many other plants.

Amygdaline (a-mig'da-lin), a. Pertaining to or resembling the almond.

Amygdaloid (a-mig'da-loid), n. [Gr. amygdalē, an almond, and eidos, form.] A term applied to an igneous rock, especially trap, containing round or almond-shaped vesicles or cavities partly or wholly filled with crystalline nodules of various minerals, particularly calcareous spar, quartz, agate, zeolite, chlorite, &c. The nodules have been formed during the consolidation of the rock, or by subsequent infiltration of siliceous or calcareous solutions. When the imbedded minerals are detached, it is porous like lava.

Amygdaloid, Amygdaloidal (a-mig'da-loid, a-mig'da-loid''al), a. 1. Almond-shaped. 2. Pertaining to amygdaloid.

Amygdalus (a-mig'da-lus), n. [Gr. amygdalos, an almond-tree.] A genus of trees and shrubs, nat. order Rosaceæ, especially known by the stone of the drupaceous fruit which incloses the kernel or seed being coarsely furrowed, and by the young leaves being folded in halves. A. communis is the almond-tree, and A. persica the peach and nectarine. See ALMOND, PEACH, NECTARINE.

Amyl, Amyle (am'il), n. [Gr. amylon, the finest flour, starch, neut. of adjective amylos, unground — a, priv., and mylē, a mill. Lit. not ground at the mill, amylon having been prepared without grinding.] (C_5H_{11}.) A hypothetical radical, said to exist in many compounds, as amylic alcohol, &c. This substance cannot exist in the free state, the molecules at the moment of its liberation combining to form the substance decane ($C_{10}H_{22}$).—Nitrite of amyl ($C_5H_{11}NO_2$), an amber-coloured fluid, smelling and tasting like essence of pears, which has been employed as a resuscitator in cases of drowning and prolonged fainting or breathlessness, as after hard running or rowing, for relieving paroxysms of colic, spasms of tetanus, spasms of the heart, &c. It is generally inhaled by the nostrils, five to ten drops being poured on paper or cloth, and when used in this way it accelerates the action of the heart more than any known agent. It is absorbed, whether introduced by rubbing on the skin, by the stomach, or by inoculation.

Amylaceous (am-il-ā'shus), a. [See AMYL.] Pertaining to starch, or the farinaceous part of grain; resembling starch.

Amylamine (a-mil'a-min), n. An organic base produced by treating amyl cyanate with caustic potash. There are three amylamines known, which are regarded as ammonia in which one, two, and three hydrogen atoms are respectively replaced by one, two, and three molecules of the radical amyl. The formulæ of these bodies, therefore, are $NH_2(C_5H_{11})$, $NH(C_5H_{11})_2$, and $N(C_5H_{11})_3$.

Amylate (am'il-āt), n. A compound of starch with a base.

Amyl-corn (am'il-korn), n. [Gr. amylon, the finest flour, starch (see AMYL), and E. corn.] A species of grain from which starch was formerly produced. Wright.

Amyle. See AMYL.

Amylene (am'il-ēn), n. (C_5H_{10}.) A hydrocarbon obtained by the dehydration of amylic alcohol by means of zinc chloride, &c. Amylene is a light, limpid, colourless liquid with a faint odour. At ordinary temperatures it speedily evaporates. It possesses anæsthetic properties, and has been tried as a substitute for chloroform, but unsuccessfully, as it has been proved to be extremely dangerous.

Amylic (am-il'ik), a. Pertaining to amyl; derived from the radical amyl; as, amylic ether.—Amylic alcohol ($C_5H_{12}O$), called also Hydrate of Amyl, a transparent colourless liquid derived from the fermentation of starch. Under the name of fusel-oil it is a product of fermentation in distilleries, being contained in crude spirit, and its removal is a great object with distillers, as its presence, even in small quantity, much injures the properties of the spirit.—Amylic fermentation, a process of fermentation in starch or sugar, in which amylic alcohol is produced.

Amylin, Amyline (am'i-lin), n. [See AMYL.] The insoluble portion of starch which constitutes the outer covering of the spherieles.

Amyloid (am'il-oid), a. [Amyl, and Gr. eidos, likeness.] Resembling, or being of the nature of, amyl.—Amyloid degeneration, in pathol. a change of structure by which the tissue or organ affected presents chemical characters of amyloid compounds or sometimes of albuminoid substances.

Amyloid (am'il-oid), n. In bot. a semi-gelatinous substance, analogous to starch, met with in some seeds, which becomes yellow in water after having been coloured blue by iodine.

Amyraldism (am'i-rald-izm), n. Eccles. the doctrine of universal grace, as explained by Amyraldus or Amyrault of France in the seventeenth century. He taught that God desires the happiness of all men, and that none are excluded by a divine decree, but that none can obtain salvation without faith in Christ; that God refuses to none the power of believing, though he does not grant to all his assistance to improve this power.

Amyraldist (am'i-rald-ist), n. One who believes in Amyraldism, or the doctrine of universal grace.

Amyridaceæ (a-mir'i-dā''sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of polypetalous plants (sometimes called Burseraceæ), consisting of tropical trees or shrubs, the leaves, bark, and fruit of which abound in fragrant resin. Myrrh, frankincense, and the gum-elemi of commerce are among their products.

Amyris (am'i-ris), n. [From Gr. myrrha, myrrh.] A genus of plants, nat. order Amyridaceæ. The species, which are found in tropical climates, are fragrant resinous shrubs. A. Plumierii is said to yield part of the gum-elemi of commerce; A. toxifera is poisonous; while the wood of A. balsamifera furnishes a sort of rosewood.

Amzel (am'zel), n. A name given to the blackbird or ouzel. Written also Amsel.

An, A (an, a), indefinite art. [A. Sax. ān, one, and also an, the indefinite article, the former being the original, the latter a developed meaning. As an indefinite article it was in Anglo-Saxon declined both in the singular and the plural, in the latter case the meaning being some, sole, only; as, āne fēawa wordā, a few words. See ONE.] A word used before nouns in the singular number to denote an individual as one among many or several belonging to the same class, and not having the same definite sense or the same force of emphasis as the, which marks a thing as contemplated by itself; as, Noah built an ark of gopher wood; Paul was an eminent apostle; bring me an orange: different from, Noah built the ark; Paul was the most eminent of the apostles; bring me the orange lying on that plate. Although an, a, and one are really the same word, and always have virtually the same sense, yet by custom an and a are used exclusively as an indefinite adjective, and one is used in numbering, or where it is intended to lay emphasis on the fact that one and only one is meant; as, bring me one orange, that is, one and no more than one. In such phrases as 'once an hour,' 'twice an age,' 'a shilling an ounce,' an has a distributive force, being equivalent to each, every. An was originally the only form of this word, but about the beginning of the thirteenth century, if not earlier, the n began to be dropped occasionally before words beginning with a consonant, and an is now rarely used except before words beginning with a vowel sound, or the sound of h when the accent falls on any syllable except the first; as, an inn, an umpire, an heir, an historian, an historiographer. As words beginning with the letter u or the combination eu are often preceded in pronunciation by the consonantal sound of y, such words do not take the form an before them; as, a university, a European reputation. This rule is not always followed, however, even by good writers. 'An useless waste of life.' Macaulay. 'An eunuch.' Congreve. Sometimes the form an is used before h even in those words which have the accent on the first syllable. Byron, for example, has an hero.

An-. 1. [The same negative particle is seen in L. in-, Skr. an-, E. Goth. and O.H.G. un-, all denoting negation.] The full form of the Greek negative prefix, but only used where necessary to prevent hiatus (that is, before a vowel), as in *an*archy. Before a consonant it becomes a.—2. A shortened form of the prefix ana, as in *an*choret, *an*eurism, *an*ode. See ANA.

An† (an), conj. [See AND, if.] 1. Old English for if; as, 'an thou wert my father as thou art but my brother.' Beau. & Fl.—2. As if.

I will roar you an't were any nightingale. Shak.

—An if, if; though.

An if a man did need a poison now, . . .
Here is a caitiff wretch would sell it him. Shak.

Ana (an'a). [Same word as E. on, G. an. Goth. ana.] 1. A Greek preposition much employed as a prefix in words of Greek origin, and implying primarily up, up to, motion upward. In composition, besides having its primary sense, as in *ana*basis, it also denotes repetition, as in *ana*baptist; inversion or transposition, as in *ana*chronism, *ana*gram; distribution, as in *ana*lysis; parallelism, as in *ana*logy.—2. In med. used in prescriptions to indicate an equal quantity of each, and often written āā; thus, Pulv. Rhei et Zinzib., āā ℥ij = powder of rhubarb and ginger of each two drachms.

Ana (ā'na). The neuter plural termination of Latin adjectives in anus, often forming an affix to the names of eminent men to denote a collection of their memorable sayings—thus Scaligeriana, Johnsoniana, the sayings of Scaliger, of Johnson, or to denote a collection of anecdotes, or gossipy matter, as in boxiana. Hence, as an independent noun, books recording such sayings; the sayings themselves.

But, all his vast heart sherris-warmed
He flashed his random speeches;
Ere days, that deal in ana, swarmed
His literary leeches. Tennyson.

Anabaptism (an-a-bap'tizm), n. [See ANABAPTIST.] The doctrine or practices of the Anabaptists.

Anabaptist (an-a-bap'tist), n. [Gr. ana, again, and baptistēs, a baptist.] One who holds the doctrine of the baptism of adults, or of the invalidity of infant baptism, and the necessity of rebaptism at an adult age. With this is generally associated the doctrine of baptism by immersion.

Anabaptistic, Anabaptistical (an'a-bap-tis"tik, an'a-bap-tis"tik-al), a. Relating to the Anabaptists or to their doctrines.

Anabaptistry (an-a-bap'tis-tri), n. The sect, practices, or doctrine of Anabaptists. 'Anabaptistry was suppressed in Munster.' Eph. Pagit. [Rare.]

Anabaptize† (an'a-bap-tīz"), v.t. pret. & pp. anabaptized; ppr. anabaptizing. To rebaptize.

Though some called their profound ignorances new lights; they were better anabaptized into the appellation of extinguishers. Whitlock.

Anabas (an'a-bas), n. [Gr. anabas, part. of second aor. of anabainō, to go up, to mount, to climb—ana, up, and bainō, to go.] A genus of fishes, the type of the family Anabasidæ (which see).

Anabasidæ, Anabatidæ (an-a-bas'i-dē, an-a-bat'i-dē), n. pl. A family of acanthopterygious fishes, remarkable for having the pharyngeal bones (or those supporting the orifice between the mouth and gullet) much enlarged and modified into a series of labyrinthine cells and duplications, so that they can retain sufficient water to keep the gills moist and enable the fish to live out of water as long as six days. The Anabas scandens, or climbing perch of India, a fish about 6 inches long, proceeds long distances over dry land in search of pools, when deserted by the water in which it has been living. The statement that it can climb the rough stems of palm-trees is now, however, considered unworthy of credit. The Ophicephalus marginatus, another member of the family, is often seen traversing the grass during the rainy season. Many of the species are much esteemed as food.

Anabasis (an-ab'a-sis), n. [Gr.—ana, up, and basis, a going, from bainō, to go.] 1. Lit. a going up; specifically, applied to the work of Xenophon descriptive of the expedition of Cyrus from Sardis, on the coast of Asia Minor, into the interior, with the view of dethroning his brother Artaxerxes, the great king of Persia, and including also an account of the retreat of the ten thousand Greek mercenaries under the leadership of Xenophon.—2. Any expedition from the coast inland, especially military. 'The anabasis of Napoleon.' De Quincey.

Anabasse (an-a-bas), n. [Fr.] A coarse kind of blanketing made in Normandy and in Holland for the African market.

Anabatidæ. See ANABASIDÆ.

Anableps (an'a-bleps), n. [Gr. anablepō, to look up.] A genus of malacopterygian fishes, remarkable for the structure of their eyes. These project and have two pupils, and each eye appears as if double, so that the animal seems to have four eyes; but there is only one crystalline humour, one vitreous humour, and one retina. The A. tetraophthalmus inhabits the rivers of Guiana. It has a cylindrical body, a flat head, and a blunt snout. It brings forth its young alive, and in a considerable state of development.

Anabole (an-ab'ō-lē), n. [Gr.—ana, up, and bolē, a throwing, from ballō, to throw.] In med. an evacuation upwards; an act by which certain matters are rejected by the mouth, including exspuition, expectoration, regurgitation, and vomiting.

Anacampseros (an-a-kamp'se-ros), n. [Gr. anakamptō, to make to turn back (from ana, back, and kamptō, to bend), and erōs, love.] 1. A plant to which the ancients attributed the quality of restoring or inducing the return of the passion of love.—2. A genus of succulent, shrubby plants, nat. order Portulaceæ, natives of the Cape of Good Hope. The flowers are large, white, rose, purple, or yellow, with twelve to twenty stamens; leaves crowded, imbricated, sessile, ovate-trigonous, terete or sub-globose, with stipules cut into five segments, often hair-like. Several species are cultivated in greenhouses.

Anacamptic (an-a-kam'tik), a. [Gr. ana, back, and kamptō, to bend.] Reflecting or reflected; specifically, a term formerly applied to that part of optics which treats of reflection. Now called Catoptrics. See CATOPTRICS.—Anacamptic sounds, sounds produced by reflection, as echoes.

Anacamptically (an-a-kam'tik-al-li), adv. By reflection; as, echoes are sounds anacamptically produced. [Rare.]

Anacamptics (an-a-kam'tiks), n. The doctrine of reflected light. See CATOPTRICS.

Anacanth (an'a-kanth), n. An osseous fish of the order Anacanthini.

Anacanthini (an'a-kan-thī"nī), n. pl. [Gr. neg. prefix an, and akantha, a spine.] An order of osseous fishes, including the cod, plaice, &c., with spineless fins, cycloid or ctenoid scales, the ventral fins either absent or below the pectorals, and ductless swim-bladder. This order contains many existing edible fishes.

Anacanthous (an-a-kan'thus), a. Spineless; specifically, a term applied to fishes of the order Anacanthini.

Anacardiaceæ (an-a-kär'di-ā"sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of polypetalous plants, with small flowers and compound dotless leaves, chiefly natives of tropical America, Africa, and India. They consist of woody plants, abounding in an acrid resin, their juice being often used as a varnish. Its use, however, is dangerous, on account of the extreme acridity of the fumes. To the order belong the sumach, the pistacias, the mango (Mangifera indica), the cashew (Anacardium occidentale), the marking-nut (Semecarpus Anacardium), the varnish-tree of Martaban (Melanorrhœa usitatissima), and the Japan-lacquer (Rhus vernix). Mastic is the produce of Pistacia Lentiscus, a bush 10 or 12 feet high, growing on the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean.

Anacardic (an-a-kär'dik), a. Pertaining to the shell of the cashew-nut.—Anacardic acid ($C_{44}H_{64}O_7$), an acid of an aromatic and burning flavour found in the pericarps of the cashew-nut. It is white and crystalline.

Anacardium (an-a-kär'di-um), n. [From Gr. ana, according to, parallel, resembling, and kardia, the heart, the fruit being thought to resemble the heart of a bird.] A genus of woody plants, nat. order Anacardiaceæ, natives of tropical America. They have a kidney-shaped fruit, borne on a fleshy pear-shaped receptacle. The receptacle is edible, and has an agreeable acid and somewhat astringent flavour. The fruits of A. occidentale are roasted, and the kernels having their acidity thus destroyed are the pleasant and wholesome cashew-nuts. (See CASHEW-NUT.) This tree yields a gum having qualities like those of gum-arabic, imported from South America under the name of Cadjii Gum.

Anacatharsis (an'a-ka-thär"sis), n. [Gr. ana, upward, and kathairō, to cleanse.] In med. purgation upward; also cough, attended by expectoration.

Anacathartic (an'a-ka-thär"tik), a. In med. throwing upward; cleansing by exciting discharges from the mouth or nose, as vomiting, expectoration, &c.

Anacathartic (an'a-ka-thär"tik), n. A medicine which excites discharges by the mouth or nose, as expectorants, emetics, sternutatories, and masticatories.

Anacephalæosis (an-a-se-fal'ē-ō"sis), n. [Gr. anakephalaiōsis, from anakephaloiō, to sum up—ana, up, and kephalē, a head.] In rhet. a summing up; recapitulation of the principal heads of a discourse.

Anacharis (an-ak'ar-is), n. [From ana, for Gr. neg. prefix an-, and charis, favour, from being often a nuisance.] A genus of plants, nat. order Hydrocharidaceæ, the species of which grow in ponds and streams of fresh water; water-thyme or water-weed. A. Alsinastrum has been introduced from North America into British rivers, canals, and ponds, and by its rapid growth in dense tangled masses tends to choke them so as materially to impede navigation. It is a favourite food of swans and some other water-birds. From its weight it does not, like other plants, float when cut, but sinks to the bottom. It was first observed in Britain in 1842.

Anachoret† (an-ak'ō-ret), n. An anchoret. 'An anachoret, the worst of all prisoners.' Bp. Hall.

Anachoretical† (an-ak'ō-ret"ik-al), a. Relating to or resembling an anachoret or anchoret.

Anachorite† (an-ak'ō-rīt), n. Same as Anchoret. 'Monks, hermits, anachorites, that contemn the world.' Burton.

Anachronic, Anachronical (an-a-kron'ik, an-a-kron'ik-al), a. Same as Anachronous.

Anachronism (an-ak'ron-izm), n. [Gr. ana, implying inversion, error, and chronos, time.] An error in computing time; any error which implies the misplacing of persons or events in time, as where Shakspere makes Hector quote Aristotle, who lived several hundred years after the assumed date of Hector, or where an artist introduces cannon into an historical picture belonging to a date previous to the invention of gunpowder; anything foreign to or out of keeping with a specified time. Anachronisms may be made in regard to mode of thought, style of writing, and the like, as well as in regard to events. 'The famous anachronism (of Virgil) in making Æneas and Dido contemporaries.' Dryden.

Anachronistic, Anachronistical (an-ak'-ron-ist"ik, an-ak'ron-ist"ik-al), a. Same as Anachronous.

Anachronous (an-ak'ron-us), a. Erroneous in date; containing an anachronism.

Anaclasis (an-ak'la-sis), n. [Gr., a bending back or recurvature.] In surg. a recurvature of any part, as of a joint or fractured limb.

Anaclastic (an-a-klas'tik), a. [From Gr. anaklasis, a bending back, reflection of light or sound—Gr. ana, back, and klasis, a breaking, from klaō, to break.] 1. Pertaining to or produced by the refraction of light: a term denominative of the apparent curves at the bottom of a vessel of water, caused by the refraction of light; also sometimes applied to that section of optics in which the refraction of light is considered, commonly called Dioptrics.—2. Bending back; flexible.—Anaclastic glass or phial, a glass with narrow mouth and wide convex bottom of such thinness that, when a little air is sucked from it, the bottom springs into a concave form with a smart crack; and when air is blown in, the bottom, with a like noise, springs into its former convex form.

Anaclastics (an-a-klas'tiks), n. A term sometimes formerly used as equivalent to Dioptrics (which see).

Anaclisis (an-ak'li-sis), n. [Gr., from anaklinō, to recline—ana, up, and klinō, to bend.] In med. the attitude of a sick person in bed, which affords important indications in several cases; decubitus.

Anacœnosis (an-a-sē-nō'sis), n. [Gr. anakoinōsis—ana, and koinos, common.] In rhet. a figure by which a speaker applies to his opponents for their opinion on the point in debate.

Anacolouthic, Anakolouthic (an'a-kol-ou''thik). Same as Anacoluthic.

Anacolouthon, Anakolouthon (an'a-kol-ou''thon). Same as Anacoluthon.

Anacoluthic, Anakoluthic (an'a-kol-ū''thik), a. In gram. and rhet. wanting sequence; containing an anacoluthon; as, an anacoluthic clause or sentence.

Anacoluthon, Anakoluthon (an'a-kol-ū''thon), n. [Gr. neg. prefix an, and akolouthеō, to follow.] In gram. and rhet. a want of coherency; want of sequence in a sentence, owing to the latter member of a sentence belonging to a different grammatical construction from the preceding. It prevails especially in Greek literature. The following are examples in English.

> He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death. Mat. xv. 4.

> His young and open soul—dissimulation
> Is foreign to its habits. Coleridge.

Anaconda (an-a-kon'da), n. The popular name of two of the largest species of the serpent tribe, viz.: (a) A Ceylonese species of the genus Python (P. tigris), brilliantly coloured, its body being covered with gold and black scales finely intermixed. It is said to have been met with 33 feet long. (b) Eunectes murinus, a native of tropical America, allied to the boa-constrictor, and the largest of the serpent tribe, attaining, it is said, the length of 40 feet. It is of a warm brown colour, with black and yellow spots along the back and sides. Both are destitute of poison fangs, and kill their victims by constriction, twisting the tail round a tree, and crushing them in the folds of the body. It is said they can distend the throat so as to admit of the passage of a buffalo. One meal lasts them for weeks. They live near water, and prey on fish, and animals that come to drink.

Anacosta (an-a-kos'ta), n. [Sp.] A woollen fabric made in Holland and exported to Spain.

Anacreontic (a-nak'rē-on''tik), a. Pertaining to or after the manner of Anacreon, a Greek poet whose odes and epigrams were celebrated for their delicate, easy, and graceful air, and for their truth to nature. They were devoted to the praise of love and wine. Hence, relating to the praise of love and wine; convivial; amatory.

Anacreontic, Anacreontique (a-nak'rē-on''tik, a-nak'rē-on''tēk), n. A poem by Anacreon, or composed in the manner of Anacreon; a little poem in praise of love and wine.

> To the miscellanies (of Cowley) succeed the anacreontiques. Johnson.

Anacrisis (a-nak'ri-sis), n. [Gr.—ana, denoting distinction, and krisis, inquiry, judgment.] In former times, an investigation of truth, interrogation of witnesses, and inquiry made into any fact, especially by torture.

Anadem (an'a-dem), n. [Gr. anadēma, a head-band or fillet—ana, up, and deō, to bind.] A band, fillet, garland, or wreath worn on the head by women and young men. 'Wreaths and anadems.' Tennyson.

Anademe (an'a-dēm), n. Same as Anadem. 'Garlands, anademes, and wreaths.' Dryden.

Anadiplosis (an-a-dip-lō'sis), n. [Gr.—ana, again, and diploos, double.] A figure in rhetoric and poetry, consisting in the repetition of the last word or words in a line or clause of a sentence in the beginning of the next; as, 'He retained his virtues amidst all his misfortunes—misfortunes which no prudence could foresee or prevent.' Johnson.

Anadrom (an'a-drom), n. [See ANADROMOUS.] A fish that leaves the sea and ascends rivers. [Rare.]

Anadromous (a-nad'rom-us), a. [Gr. ana, up, and dromos, course.] Ascending: a word applied to such fish as pass from the sea into fresh waters at stated seasons, as the salmon.

Anæmia (a-nē'mi-a), n. [Gr.—an, priv., and haima, blood.] In med. a deficiency of blood. Except as the result of a wound or the direct loss of blood, anæmia is strictly only deficiency in the fibrin, and especially in the proportion of the red corpuscles of the blood.

Anæmic (a-nem'ik), a. Pertaining to or affected with anæmia; deficient in blood; bloodless; as, anæmic symptoms, an anæmic patient.

Anæmied (a-nē'mid), a. Deprived of blood. 'The structure itself is anæmied.' Copland.

Anæmotrophy (an-e-mot'ro-fi), n. [Gr. an, priv., haima, blood, and trophē, nourishment.] In med. a deficiency of sanguineous nourishment.

Anæsthesia, Anæsthesis (an-es-thē'si-a, an-es-thē'sis), n. [Gr. anaisthesia, anaisthēsis—an, priv., and aisthanomai, to feel.] Loss of the sense of touch; diminished or lost sense of feeling; specifically, a state of insensibility, especially to the sense of pain, produced by inhaling chloroform, or by the application of other anæsthetic agents.

Anæsthetic (an-es-thet'ik), a. 1. Having the power of depriving of feeling or sensation; as, anæsthetic agents.—2. Of or belonging to anæsthesia; characterized by anæsthesia, or insensibility to sensation; as, anæsthetic effects.

Anæsthetic (an-es-thet'ik), n. A substance which has the power of depriving of feeling or sensation, as chloroform, when its vapour is inhaled. Various agents have been used to produce anæsthesia by inhalation, the principal being sulphuric, chloric, and compound ethers, amylene, keroselene, but especially chloroform. Anæsthetics are administered during parturition and in painful diseases; but their chief use is in serious surgical operations. Congelation of the part by the application of freezing-mixtures and of the spray of ether, which freezes it by its instantaneous evaporation, and pressure on the nerve trunk, are also frequently employed as anæsthetic agents in minor operations. Laughing-gas is commonly administered as an anæsthetic by dentists.

Anæsthetize (an-es'the-tiz), v.t. To bring under the influence of an anæsthetic agent, as chloroform, a freezing-mixture, &c.; to render insensible to the feeling of pain.

Anagallis (an-a-gal'lis), n. [Gr. ana, again, and agallō, to adorn.] A genus of plants, nat. order Primulaceæ; the pimpernel genus. Two of the species are natives of Britain, and several others are grown in our gardens as ornamental plants. The fruit is a dry many-seeded capsule, which opens when ripe by a transverse fissure, the top falling off like a lid. See PIMPERNEL.

Anaglyph (an'a-glif), n. [Gr. anaglyphon, embossed work—ana, up, and glyphō, to engrave.] An ornament in relief chased or embossed in precious metal or stone, as a cameo.

Anaglyphic, Anaglyphical (an-a-glif'ik, an-a-glif'ik-al), a. Pertaining to anaglyphs or to the art of chasing and embossing in relief: opposed to diaglyphic.

Anaglyphic (an-a-glif'ik), n. In sculp. work chased or embossed in relief.

Anaglyphy (an-ag'li-fi), n. 1. The art of sculpturing in relief, or of chasing or embossing ornaments in relief, in the precious stones or metals.—2. The work thus executed.

Anaglyptic, Anaglyptical (an-a-glip'tik, an-a-glip'tik-al), a. [L. anaglypticus. See ANAGLYPH.] Relating to the art of carving, engraving, enchasing, or embossing.

Anaglyptograph (an-a-glip'to-graf), n. [Gr. ana, up, glyptos, fit for engraving, from glyphō, to engrave, and graphō, to write.] An instrument for making a medallion engraving of an object in relief, such as a medal or cameo.

Anaglyptographic (an-a-glip'to-graf''ik), a. Of or pertaining to anaglyptography.—Anaglyptographic engraving, that process of engraving on an etching ground which gives to a subject the appearance of being raised from the surface of the paper, as if it were embossed, frequently employed in the representation of coins, medals, bass-reliefs, &c.

Anaglyptography (an'a-glip-tog''ra-fi), n. [See ANAGLYPTOGRAPH.] The art of copying works in relief; anaglyptographic engraving.

Anagnorisis (a-nag-nō'ri-sis), n. [Gr., recognition—ana, again, gnōrizō, to recognize.] In rhet. recognition; the unravelling of a plot in dramatic action.

Anagnostian (an-ag-nos'ti-an), n. [Gr. anagnostēs, a reader.] An ancient name for a curate who read only, or for a secretary that read to his master.

Anagoge (an'a-gō-jē), n. [Gr. anagōgē—ana, upward, and agōgē, a leading, from agō, to lead.] 1. In med. an upward rejection, as the rejection of blood from the lungs by the mouth.—2. An elevation of mind to things celestial. Bailey.—3. The spiritual meaning or application of words; especially, the application of the types and allegories of the Old Testament to subjects of the New.

Anagogetical (an'a-gō-jet''ik-al), a. Pertaining to anagoge or spiritual elevation; mysterious; anagogical.

Anagogic, Anagogical (an-a-goj'ik, an-a-goj'ik-al), a. Of or pertaining to anagoge; mysterious; elevated; spiritual; as, the rest of the Sabbath, in an anagogical sense, signifies the repose of the saints in heaven.

> We cannot apply them (prophecies) to him, but by a mystical, anagogical explication. South.

Anagogic (an-a-goj'ik), n. A mysterious or allegorical interpretation, especially of Scripture.

> The notes upon that constitution say, that the Misna Torah was composed out of the cabalistics and anagogics of the Jews, or some allegorical interpretations pretended to be derived from Moses. L. Addison.

Anagogically (an-a-goj'ik-al-li), adv. In an anagogic or mysterious sense; with religious elevation.

Anagogy (an'a-gō-jē), n. Same as Anagoge.

Anagram (an'a-gram), n. [Gr.—ana, up, again, and gramma, a letter.] In its proper sense, the letters of one or several words read backwards, and then forming a new word; thus, evil is an anagram of live. In a wider and more usual sense, a transposition of the letters of a word or sentence, to form a new word or sentence; thus, Galenus is an anagram of angelus. Dr. Burney's anagram of Horatio Nelson is one of the happiest, Honor est a Nilo (Honour is from Nile).

Anagram (an'a-gram), v.t. To form into an anagram.

Anagrammatic, Anagrammatical (an'a-gram-mat''ik, an'a-gram-mat''ik-al), a. Pertaining to or forming an anagram.

Anagrammatically (an'a-gram-mat''ik-al-li), adv. In the manner of an anagram.

Anagrammatism (an-a-gram'mat-izm), n. The act or practice of making anagrams.

Anagrammatist (an-a-gram'mat-ist), n. A maker of anagrams.

Anagrammatize (an-a-gram'mat-īz), v.t. To transpose, as the letters of a word, so as to form an anagram.

> Others anagrammatize it from Eva (Eve) into Væ, because they say she was the cause of our woe. Austin.

Anagrammatize (an-a-gram'mat-iz), v.i. To make anagrams.

Anagraph (an'a-graf), n. [Gr. anagraphē, a writing out—ana, up, and graphō, to write.] An inventory; a commentary.

Anagua (a-nä'gwa), n. A name in Texas for Ehretia elliptica, a small tree of the borage family, with hard close-grained wood.

Anakoluthic. See ANACOLUTHIC.

Anakoluthon. See ANACOLUTHON.

Anal (ā'nal), a. [L. anus, the fundament.] Pertaining to or situated near the anus; as, the anal fin in fishes, the fin placed between the vent and tail, which expands perpendicularly.

Analcim, Analcime (a-nal'sim), n. [Gr. an, priv., and alkimos, strong, from alkē, strength.] A zeolitic mineral found generally crystallized in cubic crystals, but also amorphous, and in reniform, mammillary, laminated, or radiated masses. It is of frequent occurrence in trap-rocks, especially in the cavities of amygdaloids. It melts under the blowpipe into a semi-transparent glass. By friction it acquires a weak electricity; hence its name.

Analect (an'a-lekt), n. [See ANALECTA.] A small piece selected from an author; an extract.

Analecta (an-a-lek'ta), n. pl. [Gr. neut. pl. of analektos, select—ana, up, and legō, to gather.] Collections of extracts or small pieces from different authors.

Analectic (an-a-lek'tik), a. Relating to analecta, collections, or selections; made up of selections; as, an analectic magazine.

Analemma (an-a-lem'ma), n. [L., a sun-dial; Gr., a pedestal—ana, and lambanō, to take, hold.] 1. A form of sun-dial, now disused. 2. In geom. a projection of the sphere on the plane of the meridian, orthographically made by straight lines, circles, and ellipses, the eye being supposed at an infinite distance, and in the east or west points of the horizon.—3. An instrument of wood or brass on which this kind of projection is drawn: formerly used in solving astronomical problems.—4. A tabular mark, usually in the form of the figure 8, depicted across the torrid zone on an artificial terrestrial globe, to notify the sun's declination on any day of the year.

Analepsis (an-a-lep'sis), n. [Gr., from ana, up or again, and lēpsis, a taking, from lambanō, to take.] In med. recovery of strength after disease.

Analepsy (an'a-lep-si), n. In med. a species of epileptic attack of sudden and frequent occurrence, but not regarded as dangerous.

Analeptic (an-a-lep'tik), a. [Gr. analēptikos, restorative. See ANALEPSIS.] Corroborating; invigorating; giving strength after disease; as, an analeptic medicine.

Analogal† (an-al'og-al), a. Analogous. Sir M. Hale.

Analogical (an-a-loj'ik-al), a. 1. Having analogy, resemblance, or relation; analogous.

> There is placed the minerals between the inanimate and vegetable province, participating something analogical to either. Sir M. Hale.

2. Used by way of analogy; founded on or directed by analogy; expressing or implying analogy. 'Analogical representation.' Stillingfleet.

> We have words which are proper and not analogical. Reid.

Analogically (an-a-loj'ik-al-li), adv. In an analogical manner; by way of similitude, relation, or agreement.

> A prince is analogically styled a pilot, being to the state as a pilot is to the vessel. Berkeley.

Analogicalness (an-a-loj'ik-al-nes), n. The quality of being analogical; fitness to be applied for the illustration of some analogy.

Analogion (an-a-loj'i-on), n. [Gr.] Eccles. a term for a reading-desk or lectern; also for a movable pulpit.

Analogism (an-al'o-jizm), n. [Gr. analogismos.] 1. In logic, an argument from the cause to the effect; an a priori argument.—2. Investigation of things by the analogy they bear to each other.

Analogist (an-al'o-jist), n. One who adheres to analogy.

Analogize (an-al'o-jīz), v.t. pret. & pp. analogized; ppr. analogizing. To explain by analogy; to form some resemblance between; to consider with regard to its analogy to something else.

Analogon (an-al'og-on), n. Something analogous; an analogue. Coleridge. [Rare.]

Analogous (an-al'og-us), a. 1. Having analogy; corresponding to something else: bearing some resemblance or proportion; as, there is something in the exercise of the mind analogous to that of the body; animal organs, as the wing of a bird and that of a bat, which perform the same function, though different in structure, are analogous.—2. In chem. closely similar, but differing in some approximate degree as to each of the more prominent characters. Dana.—SYN. Correspondent, similar, like.

Analogously (an-al'og-us-li), adv. In an analogous manner.

Analogue (an'a-log), n. [Gr. analogos.] Something having analogy with something else; an object having some agreement or correspondence in relations or functions with another object.

> An ear-trumpet is a true analogue of the telescope. R. A. Proctor.

Specifically, in philol. (a) a word corresponding with another; an analogous term. (b) In zool. and bot. an animal or plant belonging to one group or region corresponding in some special and essential attributes or relations to another member of another group or region, so that it is its representative or counterpart. (c) In compar. anat. an organ in one species or group having the same function as an organ of different structure in another species or group. The difference between homologue and analogue may be illustrated by the wing of a bird and that of a butterfly; as the two totally differ in anatomical structure, they cannot be said to be homologous, but they are analogous in function, since they both serve for flight.

Analogy (an-al'o-ji), n. [Gr. analogia—ana, according to, and logos, ratio, proportion.] 1. An agreement or likeness between things in some circumstances or effects, when the things are otherwise entirely different; thus, when we say that learning enlightens the mind, we recognize an analogy between learning and light, the former being to the mind what light is to the eye, enabling it to discover things before hidden. Analogy is sometimes confounded with similarity, but improperly. The latter denotes general likeness or resemblance; the former implies general difference, with identity or sameness in one or more relations or functions. Thus there is analogy, but no similarity between the lungs of animals and the gills of fishes. [We say that there is an analogy between things and that one thing has an analogy to or with another.]—2. In geom. equality, proportion, or similarity of ratios; thus, 2 is to 6 as 3 is to 9, is an analogy.—3. In gram. conformity to the spirit, structure, or general rules of a language; similarity as respects any of the characteristics of a language, as derivation, inflection, pronunciation, &c.

Analysable (an-a-līz'a-bl), a. Capable of being analysed.

Analysableness (an-a-līz'a-bl-nes), n. The state or quality of being analysable.

Analysation (an'a-līz-ā''shon), n. The act of analysing.

Analyse (an'a-līz), v.t. pret. & pp. analysed; ppr. analysing. [Fr. analyser. See ANALYSIS.] To resolve into its elements; to separate, as a compound subject, into its parts or propositions, for the purpose of an examination of each separately; as, to analyse a mineral; to analyse an action to ascertain its morality.

> When sympathy is in action we may, by analysing our idea of it, reduce it to five different heads, and may classify it as continued, or contiguous, or remote, or similar, or dissimilar. Buckle.

[Analyse and its derivatives are sometimes incorrectly written with z instead of s.]

Analyse† (an'a-līz), n. Analysis.

> The analyse of it (a tractate) may be spared, since it is in many hands. Bp. Hacket.

Analyser (an'a-līz-ér), n. One who or that which analyses or has the power to analyse; as, in optics, the part of a polariscope which receives the light after polarization and exhibits its properties, as a movable reflecting plate, a tourmaline, or a doubly refracting crystal.

Analysis (an-al'i-sis), n. pl. Analyses (an-al'i-sēz). [Gr. prefix ana, implying distribution (see ANA), and lysis, a loosing, resolving, from lyō, to loosen.] 1. The resolution of a compound object whether of the senses or the intellect into its constituent elements or component parts; a consideration of anything in its separate parts and their relation to each other; an examination of the different parts of a subject, each separately, as the words which compose a sentence, the tones of a tune, or the simple propositions which enter into an argument: opposed to synthesis.

> Descartes . . . was chiefly pre-eminent for his power of intense reflection—for his acute analysis of mind and its operations. J. D. Morell.

2. In math. the resolving of problems by algebraic equations. The analysis of finite quantities is otherwise called algebra. The analysis of infinites is the method of fluxions, or the differential calculus. See Analytical Geometry under ANALYTIC.—3. In chem. the process of decomposing a compound substance with a view to determine either (a) what elements it contains (qualitative analysis), or (b) how much of each element is present (quantitative analysis).—4. In logic, the tracing of things to their source, and the resolving of knowledge into its original principles.—5. A syllabus or table of the principal heads of a continued discourse, disposed in their natural order.—6. A brief, methodical illustration of the principles of a science. In this sense it is nearly synonymous with synopsis.—Spectrum analysis. See SPECTRUM, SPECTROSCOPE.—Assay, Analysis. See ASSAY.

Analyst (an'a-list), n. One who analyses or is versed in analysis.

Analytic, Analytical (an-a-lit'ik, an-a-lit'-ik-al), n. 1. Pertaining to analysis; that resolves into first principles or elements; that separates into parts or original principles; that resolves a compound body or subject; as, an analytical experiment in chemistry, or an analytical investigation of facts to determine principles: opposed to synthetic. Specifically.—2. In philol. free from inflections, and employing instead prepositions and auxiliary verbs to express modifications of meaning, and show the relations of words in a sentence; as, an analytic language.—Analytical or co-ordinate geometry, is the method invented by Descartes of applying algebra to the investigation of the properties of lines, figures, and bodies of three dimensions, certain properties of these geometrical magnitudes being expressed by means of equations, which show the relations subsisting between them and two given straight lines or three given planes intersecting one another, and from which other properties may be deduced. Plane analytical geometry is based on the fact that every point in the same plane can have its position determined by referring it to two lines that intersect one another, just as any spot on the earth is determined when its latitude, or angular distance from the equator, and longitude, or angular distance from the first meridian, are given; and the analytical geometry of solid bodies is based on the fact that the position of any point in space can be determined by reference to three intersecting planes. In plane analytical geometry the intersecting lines are called the co-ordinate axes, their point of intersection the origin, and the distances of any point from the two lines are called the co-ordinates of that point, the one being called the ordinate, and the other (usually the horizontal distance) the abscissa. The distance of the point from either of the lines is always measured by the length of a line parallel to the other. The equation or equations of any line or figure state some relation between the co-ordinates of any point in that line, or in the circumference of the figure, and some other line or lines derived from these magnitudes. Thus the equation of a circle shows the relation between the radius and the co-ordinates of any point in the circumference. In the analytical geometry of solid bodies the intersecting planes are called the co-ordinate planes, and they are always given with their lines of intersection, which are called the co-ordinate axes, passing through the same point, called the origin. Another method of determining the position of points in space for the purposes of analytical geometry is to give the distance of the point from a given point, with the direction in which that distance must be measured with reference to a given line. This is called the system of polar co-ordinates, and is of great importance in mechanics and astronomy. The point to which all others are referred is called the pole, and the distance of any point the radius vector of that point. Most of the problems of analytical geometry are facilitated by the differential and integral calculus.

Analytically (an-a-lit'ik-al-li), adv. In an analytical manner; in the manner of analysis.

Analytics (an-a-lit'iks), n. The science of analysis.

Anamese (an'a-mēz), a. Of or pertaining to Anam, a feudatory dependency of China, comprising a large part of the south-eastern peninsula of Asia from the Chinese Empire southward.

Anamese (an'a-mēz), n. 1. A native or inhabitant, or the natives or inhabitants of Anam.—2. The language spoken in Anam.

Anamesite (a-nam'e-sīt), n. [Gr. anamesos, intermediate.] A variety of basalt intermediate between the very fine-grained compact form (basalt), and the coarse-grained conspicuously crystalline form (dolerite).

Anamirta (a-na-mėr'ta), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Menispermaceæ, constituted by some botanists for the reception of Cocculus indicus.

Anamnesis (an-am-nē'sis), n. [Gr.—ana, again, and mnēsis, remembrance.] In rhet. a figure which calls to remembrance something omitted.

Anamnestic (an-am-nes'tik), a. Aiding the memory.

Anamniotic (an-am'ni-ot"ik), a. [Gr. an, priv., and amnion.] Having no amnion; as, fishes and amphibia are anamniotic vertebrates.

Anamorphism (an-a-mor'fizm), n. Same as Anamorphosis.

Anamorphosis (an-a-mor'fō-sis or an'a-mor-fō"sis), n. [Gr. ana, again, and morphōsis, formation, from morphē, a form.] 1. In persp. a term denoting a drawing executed in such a manner as to present a distorted image of the object represented, but which, when viewed from a certain point, or reflected by a curved mirror or through a polyhedron, shows the object in its true proportions.—2. In bot. an anomalous or monstrous development of any part of a plant, owing to a change in the conditions accompanying growth, so that it presents an appearance altogether unlike the typical form, as when the calyx of a rose assumes the form of a leaf. Lichens are so liable to this change of form from modifications of climate, soil, &c., that some varieties have been placed in three or four genera.—3. In zool. and bot. the gradual change of form, generally ascending, traced in a group of animals or plants, the members of which succeed each other in point of time. Thus the earlier members of any group observed in the lower geologic formations are by some assumed to be of a lower type and in point of development inferior to their analogues in the more recent strata, or now living; but this has been controverted, especially by the opponents of Darwinism.

Anamorphosy (an-a-mor'fo-si), n. Same as Anamorphosis.

Anan † (a-nan'), adv. Anon; immediately.

> Go to, little blushet, for this, anan
> You'll steal forth a laugh in the shade of your fan.
> B. Jonson.

Anan (a-nan'), interj. An interrogative particle employed by uneducated persons when they do not understand or have not heard properly what has been said.

> Well, what say you to a friend who would take the bitter bargain off your hand? Anan! Goldsmith.

Anana (an-ā'na), n. [See ANANASSA.] A pine-apple. [Rare.]

> Witness thou best anana, thou the pride
> Of vegetable life. Thomson.

Ananas (an-ā'nas), n. [See ANANASSA.] A name of the pine-apple.

Ananassa (an-a-nas'sa), n. [Ananas, anassa, or nanas, native name among the Tupis of Brazil.] A genus of plants, nat. order Bromeliacæ. A. sativa produces the pine-apple (which see).

Ananchytes (an-ang-kī'tez), n. A genus or subdivision of fossil sea-urchins belonging to the tribe Spatangidæ, called in the south of England 'shepherds' crowns' and 'fairy loaves,' and especially characteristic of the upper chalk. They have a raised helmet-like form, simple ambulacra, transverse mouth, and oblong outlet.

Ananchytes.
1, A. ovatus. 2, A. tuberculatus.

Anandrous (an-an'drus), a. [Gr. an, priv., and anēr, andros, a male or stamen.] In bot. a term applied to flowers that are destitute of a stamen (female flowers): formerly applied to cryptogamic plants, because they were supposed to have no male organs.

Anangular (an-ang'gū-lėr), a. [Gr. prefix an for a, priv., and E. angular.] Having no angle or angles.

Anantherous (an-an'thėr-us), a. [Gr. an, priv., and E. anther.] In bot. destitute of anthers.

Ananthous (an-an'thus), a. [Gr. an, priv., and anthos, a flower.] Destitute of flowers.

Anapæst (an'a-pest), n. Same as Anapest.

Anapæstic, Anapæstical (an-a-pes'tik, an-a-pes'tik-al), a. Same as Anapestic.

Anapest (an'a-pest), n. [L. anapæstus, from Gr. anapaistos, struck back, reversed—ana, back, and paiō, to strike.] A poetical foot consisting of three syllables, the first two short or unaccented, the last long or accented: the reverse of the dactyl.

Anapestic (an-a-pes'tik), n. The anapestic measure; an anapestic verse. The following is an example of anapestics.

> Cān ă bōsŏm sō gēntlē rĕmāin
> Ūnmōved whĕn hĕr Cōrȳdŏn sīghs? Shenstone.

Anapestic, Anapestical (an-a-pes'tik, an-a-pes'tik-al), a. Pertaining to an anapest; consisting of anapestic feet.

Anapestically (an-a-pes'tik-al-li), adv. In an anapestic manner.

Anaphora (an-af'o-ra), n. [Gr., a bringing again, a recurrence—ana, back, again, and pherō, to bring.] 1. In rhet. a figure in which the same word or words are repeated at the beginning of two or more succeeding verses or clauses of a sentence; as, 'Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world?' 1 Cor. i. 20.—2. In astron. a term applied to the oblique ascensions of the stars.

Anaphrodisiac (an-af'ro-diz"i-ak), n. [Gr. neg. prefix an, and aphrodisiakos, venereal, from aphrodisia, sexual pleasure. See APHRODITE.] A substance capable of dulling sexual appetite; an antaphrodisiac.

Anaplastic (an-a-plas'tik), a. Of or pertaining to, performed by, or used in, the operation of anaplasty; as, an anaplastic instrument.

Anaplasty (an'a-plas-ti), n. [Gr. ana, again, and plassō, to fashion.] In surg. an operation to repair superficial lesions, or solutions of continuity, by the employment of adjacent healthy structure. Artificial noses, &c., are thus made.

Anaplerotic (an'a-ple-rot"ik), a. [L. anapleroticus, from Gr. anaplēroō, to fill up or full—ana, up, and plēroō, to fill.] In med. filling up; promoting granulation of wounds or ulcers.

Anaplerotic (an'a-ple-rot"ik), n. A remedy which promotes the granulation of wounds and ulcers.

Anapophysis (an-a-pof'i-sis), n. [Gr.—ana, back, and apophysis, an offshoot.] In anat. the process of a vertebra which, arising in the dorsal region, recedes to the side and projects more or less backward. It is well developed in the hare and most rodents.

Anarch (an'ärk), n. [See ANARCHY.] The author of anarchy; one who excites revolt.

> Him thus the anarch old
> With faltering speech, and visage incompos'd, > Answer'd. Milton.

Anarchal, Anarchial (an-ärk'al, an-ärk'i-al), a. Ungoverned; lawless; anarchical. [Rare.]

> We are in the habit of calling those bodies of men anarchal which are in a state of effervescence.
> Landor.

Anarchic, Anarchical (an-ärk'ik, an-ärk'-ik-al), a. Of or pertaining to, proceeding from, or dictated by a state of anarchy; without rule or government; in a state of confusion.

> They expect that they shall hold in obedience an anarchic people by an anarchic law. Burke.

Anarchism (an'ärk-izm), n. Confusion; anarchy. 'Absolute anarchism.' Sir E. Dering.

Anarchist (an'ärk-ist), n. One who excites revolt or promotes disorder in a state; an anarch.

Anarchy (an'är-ki), n. [Gr. anarchia, lawlessness—an, priv., and archē, rule.] 1. Want of government; a state of society when there is no law or supreme power, or when the laws are not efficient, and individuals do what they please with impunity; political confusion.

> It seemed but too likely that England would fall under the most odious and degrading of all kinds of government, . . . uniting all the evils of despotism to all the evils of anarchy. Macaulay.

2. Confusion in general. 'There being then . . . an anarchy, as I may term it, in authors and their reckoning of years.' Fuller.

Anarrhexis (an-ar-reks'is), n. [Gr., from anarrhēgnymi—ana, up, and rēgnymi, to break.] In surg. the rebreaking of a united fracture.

Anarrhichas (a-när'ri-kas), n. [Gr. anarrhichaomai, to clamber or scramble up, some of the species being said to be able to clamber up rocks.] A genus of acanthopterygian fishes, family Blennioidæ. The species are ravenous and found in the north seas. A. lupus is the sea-wolf, wolf-fish, or cat-fish. See WOLF-FISH.

Anarthropoda (an-är-throp'o-da), n. pl. [Gr. an, priv., arthros, joint, and pous, podos, foot.] One of the two great divisions (the Arthropoda being the other) of the Annulosa, or ringed animals, in which there are no articulated appendages. It includes the spoon-worms, leeches, earthworms, tube-worms, and sand-worms.

Anarthropodous (an-är-throp'o-dus), a. Of or pertaining to the Anarthropoda.

Anarthrous (an-är'thrus), a. [Gr. an, priv., and arthron, a joint or article.] 1. In gram. without the article.—2. In zool. having neither wings nor legs, as worms, leeches, &c.

Anas (ā'nas), n. [L.] A Linnæan genus of birds, included in the order Palmipedes (or web-footed birds) in the system of Cuvier, and divided by recent ornithologists into a number of genera, one of which, retaining the name Anas, contains the true ducks. See DUCK, 1.

Anasarca (an-a-sär'ka), n. [Gr. ana, implying distribution, through, and sarks, flesh.] 1. In med. dropsy of the cellular tissue; an effusion of serum into the cellular substance, occasioning a soft, pale, inelastic swelling of the skin; general dropsy.—2. In bot. the condition of plants when the tissues get gorged with fluid in very wet weather.

Anasarcous (an-a-sär'kus), a. Belonging to or affected by anasarca or dropsy; dropsical.

Anastaltic (an-a-stal'tik), a. [Gr. anastaltikos, fitted for checking, from anastellō, to send up or back, to check—ana, up, back, and stellō, to send.] In med. astringent; styptic.

Anastatic (an-a-stat'ik), a. [Gr. anastasis, a setting up—ana, up, again, and histanai, to stand.] Raised; consisting of or furnished with raised characters; as, anastatic plates. —Anastatic printing or engraving, a mode of obtaining facsimile impressions of any printed page or engraving by transferring it to a plate of zinc, which, on being subjected to the action of an acid, is etched or eaten away with the exception of the parts covered with the ink, which parts being thus protected from the action of the acid, are left in relief so that they can readily be printed from.

Anastatica (an-a-stat'i-ka), n. [Gr. ana, up, and histanai, to stand.] A genus of plants, nat. order Cruciferæ. A. hierochuntica is the rose of Jericho or resurrection plant, found near the Dead Sea, and remarkable for the power the dried plant possesses of Rose of Jericho (Anastatica hierochuntica).

1, The plant. 2, The root dried. 3, The root expanded after being put in water.

absorbing water when placed in it and appearing to live. It is said to have bloomed at Christmas to salute the birth of Christ, and to have remained expanded till Easter or the resurrection. The plant is gathered in great quantities and sent to Jerusalem, where it is sold to pilgrims.

Anastomize (a-nas'tō-mīz), v.i. Same as Anastomose. [Rare.]

Anastomose (a-nas'tō-mōz), v.i. pret. & pp. anastomosed; ppr. anastomosing. [Fr. anastomoser, Gr. anastomoō—ana, again, anew, and stoma, a mouth.] In anat. and bot. to inosculate or run into each other; to communicate with each other, as the arteries and veins. 'The ribbing of the leaf, and the anastomosing net-work of its vessels.' Is. Taylor.

Anastomosis (a-nas'tō-mō"sis), n. In anat. and bot. the inosculation of vessels, or the opening of one vessel into another, as an artery into another artery, or a vein into a vein. By means of anastomosis, if the course of a fluid is arrested in one vessel it can proceed along others. It is by anastomosis that circulation is re-established in amputated limbs, and in aneurism when the vessel is tied.

Anastomotic (a-nas'tō-mot"ik), a. 1. Pertaining to anastomosis.—2.† In med. having the quality of removing obstructions.

Anastomotic† (a-nas'tō-mot"ik), n. A medicine supposed to have the power of opening the mouths of vessels, and promoting circulation, such as cathartics, deobstruents, and sudorifics.

Anastrophe, Anastrophy (a-nas'tro-fe), n. [Gr., a turning back—ana, back or again, and strephō, to turn.] In rhet. and gram. an inversion of the natural order of words; as, 'echoed the hills,' for 'the hills echoed.'

Anatase (an'a-tās), n. [Gr. anatasis, extension, so named from the length of its crystals.] Octahedral oxide of titanium; a mineral that shows a variety of colours by reflected light, from indigo blue to reddish brown; octahedrite. It is usually crystallized in acute, elongated, pyramidal octahedrons.

Anathema (a-nath'ē-ma), n. [Gr. anathema, in New Testament and ecclesiastical Greek, an accursed thing, a thing devoted to evil, from anatithēmi, to set up as a votive offering, to dedicate—ana, up, and tithēmi, to set or place.] 1. A curse or denunciation pronounced with religious solemnity by ecclesiastical authority, and accompanied by excommunication. This species of excommunication was practised in the ancient churches against notorious offenders. Churches were warned not to receive them, magistrates and private persons were admonished not to harbour or maintain them, and priests were enjoined not to converse with them or attend their funeral. Called also Judiciary Anathema.—2. Execration generally; denouncement of evil.

She fled to London, followed by the anathemas of both. Thackeray.

3. The person or thing devoted to destruction.

The Jewish nation was an anathema destined to destruction. St. Paul . . . says he could wish to save them from it, and to become an anathema, and to be destroyed himself. Locke.

—Abjuratory anathema, the act of a convert who anathematizes the heresy which he abjures.

Anathematical (a-nath'ē-mat"ik-al), a. Pertaining to or having the nature of an anathema.

Anathematically (a-nath'ē-mat"ik-al-li), adv. In the manner of anathema.

Anathematism (a-nath'ē-mat-izm), n. Act of anathematizing; an excommunicatory curse.

We find a law of Justinian forbidding anathematisms to be pronounced against the Jewish Hellenists. Jer. Taylor.

Anathematization (a-nath'ē-mat'iz-ā"shon), n. The act of anathematizing; an excommunicatory curse. 'Anathematizations of persons deceased in the peace of the church.' Barrow.

Anathematize (a-nath'ē-mat-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. anathematized; ppr. anathematizing. To pronounce an anathema against.

Anathematize (a-nath'ē-mat-īz), v.i. To pronounce anathemas; to denounce; to curse.

Well may mankind shriek, inarticulately anathematizing as they can. Carlyle.

Anathematizer (a-nath'ē-mat-īz-ėr), n. One who anathematizes.

Anatheme (an'a-thēm), n. An anathema. [Rare.]

Your holy father of Rome hath smitten with his thunderbolt of excommunications and anathemes . . . most of the orthodox churches of the world. Sheldon.

Anatidæ (a-nat'i-dē), n. pl. [L. anas, anatis, a duck, and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] A family of web-footed anserine or natatorial birds, of which the genus Anas is the type.

Anatifa (a-nat'i-fa), n. [Contr. for Anatifera—L. anas, anatis, a duck, and fero, to bear.] A genus of cirripeds, now called Lepas. From a fancied resemblance of its shell to a bird, there arose an absurd fable that a species of goose, called the barnacle goose (Anas), came from this animal; hence the name Anatifa, as well as goose-mussel. See LEPAS, LEPADIDÆ.

Anatifer (a-nat'i-fėr), n. A barnacle. See ANATIFA.

Anatiferous (an-a-tif'ėr-us), n. [L. anas, anatis, a duck, and fero, to produce.] Producing ducks.

If there be anatiferous trees, whose corruption breaks forth into barnacles; yet, if they corrupt, they degenerate into maggots, which produce not them again. Sir T. Browne.

Anatinæ (an-a-tī'nē), n. pl. [L. anas, anatis, a duck.] A sub-family of the Anatidæ, comprehending the true ducks, distinguished from swans and geese by having broader bills, a more waddling gait from their legs being placed farther behind, and the existence of a marked difference in the plumage of the sexes. The species are sometimes divided into the oceanic ducks, as the scoter, the garrot, the eider, the scaup, &c.; and the lake ducks, as the shieldrake, the teal, the widgeon, the mallard, and the common domestic duck.

Anatocism (a-nat'o-sizm), n. [L. anatocismus, Gr. anatokismos, compound interest—ana, again, and tokizō, to lend on interest, tokos, produce, from tiktō, to bring forth.] Interest upon interest; the taking of compound interest, or the contract by which such interest is secured. [Rare.]

Anatomic, Anatomical (an-a-tom'ik, an-a-tom'ik-al), a. Belonging to anatomy or dissection; produced by or according to the principles of anatomy or natural structure of the body; relating to the parts of the body when dissected or separated; as, anatomical observations.

Anatomically (an-a-tom'ik-al-li), adv. In an anatomical manner; by means of dissection; according to the doctrine of anatomy.

Anatomism (a-nat'o-mizm), n. The doctrine of the examination of the parts of an organic body, to explain the phenomena of the organism.

Anatomist (a-nat'o-mist), n. One who dissects bodies; more generally, one who is skilled in the art of dissection, or versed in the doctrine and principles of anatomy.

Anatomization (a-nat'o-miz-ā"shon), n. The act of anatomizing.

Anatomize (a-nat'o-mīz), v.t. pret. & pp. anatomized; ppr. anatomizing. 1. To dissect; to cut in pieces, as an animal or vegetable body, for the purpose of displaying or examining the structure and use of the several parts.—2. Fig. to lay open or expose minutely; to analyse; as, to anatomize an argument.

In her the painter had anatomized time's ruin. Shak.

Anatomy (a-nat'o-mi), n. [Gr. anatomē—ana, implying separation and distribution, and tomē, a cutting.] 1. The art of dissecting or artificially separating the different parts of an organized body, to discover their situation, structure, and economy; the science which treats of the internal structure of organized bodies; generally applied more specifically to the dissection of or to the knowledge of the structure of the human body; that branch which treats of the structure of plants being called vegetable anatomy, and that which treats of the structure of animals animal anatomy or zootomy.—Special or descriptive anatomy, that branch which treats of the organs of which the human body consists, with regard to their shape, position, and mutual relations.—General anatomy, that branch which treats of the structure and physical properties of the different tissues which are common to several organs, without reference to the form or situation of the organs themselves.—Pathological anatomy, that branch of anatomy which treats of the changes in structure of organs and tissues produced by disease, and of congenital malformations.—Comparative anatomy, the science which compares the anatomy of different classes or species of animals, as that of man with quadrupeds, or that of fishes with quadrupeds.—Transcendental anatomy, that branch which investigates the plan or model upon which the animal frame or organs are formed.—Surgical anatomy, that branch which demonstrates the relative position of organs or parts, with a view to those operations which it may be necessary to perform upon them.—Physiological anatomy, that branch which treats of the structure of organs, only in as far as it elucidates their functions.—Artificial anatomy, the art of making models in wax or other materials, to illustrate the healthy or diseased structure of parts.—2. Fig. the act of dividing anything, material or intellectual, for the purpose of examining its parts; as, the anatomy of a discourse.—3. The body stripped of its integuments and muscles; a skeleton, or the corporeal frame of bones entire, without the skin, flesh, and vessels; hence, a thin, meagre person.

The anatomy of a little child . . . is accounted a greater rarity than the skeleton of a man in full stature. Fuller.

They brought one Pinch, a hungry, lean-faced villain,
A mere anatomy, a mountebank. Shak.

Anatreptic (an-a-trep'tik), a. [Gr. anatreptikos, from anatrepō, to overturn—ana, up, and trepō, to turn.] Overthrowing; defeating; prostrating: a word applied to those dialogues of Plato which represent a defeat in the gymnastic exercises.

Anatripsis (an-a-trip'sis), n. [Gr., from ana, denoting repetition, and tribō, tripsō, to rub.] In med. friction employed as a remedy.

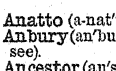
Anatron (an'a-tron), n. [Fr. anatron; Ar. al-natrūn, al-nitrūn, from Gr. nitron, a mineral alkali, either soda or potassa, or both.] 1. Spume or glass gall, a scum which rises upon melted glass in the furnace, and when taken off dissolves in the air, and coagulates into common salt.—2. The salt which collects on the walls of vaults; saltpetre.

Anatropal, Anatropous (a-nat'rop-al, a-nat'rop-us), a. [Gr. ana, noting inversion, and trepō, to turn.] In bot. having the ovule inverted at an early period in its development, so that the chalaza is at its apparent apex.



Anatropal Ovule.

Anatto (a-nat'tō), n. Same as Arnotto.

Anbury (an'bu-rī), n. Same as Ambury (which see).

Ancestor (an'ses-tėr), n. [O.Fr. ancestre, ancessor, Fr. ancêtre, an ancestor, from L. antecessor, a predecessor—ante, before, and cedo, cessum, to go. See CEDE.] 1. One from whom a person descends, either by the father or mother, at any distance of time; a progenitor; a forefather.—2. In law, one who has preceded another in the possession of real estate; one from whom an inheritance is derived: the correlative of heir.

Ancestorial (an-ses-tō'ri-al), a. Ancestral. 'Ancestorial and national glories.' Sir F. Palgrave.

Ancestorially (an-ses-tō'ri-al-li), adv. In an ancestorial manner; with regard to ancestors. Sidney Smith.

Ancestral (an-ses'tral), a. Pertaining to ancestors; claimed or descending from ancestors; as, an ancestral estate; ancestral trees. 'Seated on his ancestral throne.' Macaulay.

Tenure by homage ancestral was merely tenancy-in-chief by immemorial prescription in the family. C. H. Pearson.

Ancestress (an'ses-tres), n. A female ancestor. [Rare.]

This ancestress is a lady, or rather the ghost of a lady. Carlyle.

Ancestry (an'ses-tri), n. 1. A series of ancestors or progenitors; lineage, or those who compose the line of natural descent. 'Headless statues of his ancestry.' Macaulay. Hence—2. Honourable descent; high birth.

Title and ancestry render a good man more illustrious, but a bad one more conspicuous. Addison.

Anchilops (ang'ki-lops), n. [Gr., corrupted from aigilops—aiks, aigos, a goat, and ōps, the eye.] In med. an abscess in the inner angle of the eye; an incipient fistula lachrymalis.

Anchithere (ang'ki-thēr), n. A member of the genus Anchitherium.

The horse can even boast a pedigree in this quarter of the world, in a right line, through a slender three-toed ancestry, as far back as the anchithere of the eocene period. Edin. Review.

Anchitherium (ang-ki-thē'ri-um), n. [Gr. anchi, near, and thērion, a wild beast.] A fossil genus of ungulate or hoofed mammals, from the upper eocene and lower miocene, belonging to the family Equidæ, or horses, having on each foot a single functional hoofed toe, flanked by two small hoofed digits, which were sufficiently developed to touch the ground. The only recognized species was about the size of a sheep, and was closely allied to the Palæotherium.

Anchor (ang'kėr), n. [A. Sax. ancor, ancer, G. D. and Dan. anker, Icel. akkeri, probably all borrowed from L. ancora, Gr. angkyra, an anchor, whence Fr. ancre, Pr. Sp. Pg. It. ancora. From a root ang, crooked, bent, seen in L. angulus, a corner, and uncus, a hook, crooked; in Gr. angkos, a bend, angkale, angkyle, the bend of the arm, E. ankle, A. Sax. ancleow, G. enkel, the ankle; Bav. anke, the bend of the neck; and probably in E. angle, a fish-hook, to fish with a hook; G. angel, a hook.] 1. An implement for holding a ship or other vessel at rest in the water. In former times anchors were merely large stones, baskets of stones, &c. The anchor now used is of iron, formed with a strong shank a, at one extremity of which is the crown c, from which branch out two arms b b, terminating in broad palms or flukes d d, the sharp extremity of which is the peak or bill; at the other end of the shank is the stock e e, a transverse piece, behind which is a shackle or ring, to which a cable can be attached. The principal use of the stock is to cause the arms to fall so as one of the flukes shall enter the ground. According to their various forms and uses, anchors obtain the epithets of the sheet, best bower, small bower, spare, stream, kedge, and grappling or grapnel. Those of the largest size carried by men-of-war are the best and small bowers, the sheet, and the spare; to which are added the stream and the kedge, which are used for particular or for temporary purposes. The number and weight of anchors ought to bear a proper relation to the size of the ship. Many improvements and novelties in the shape and construction of anchors have been introduced within recent times. The principal names connected with those alterations are those of Lieut. Rodgers, who introduced the hollow-shanked anchor with the view of increasing the strength without adding to the weight; Mr. Porter, who made the arms and flukes movable by pivoting them to the stock instead of fixing them immovably, causing the anchor to take a readier and firmer hold, and avoiding the chance of the cable becoming foul; Mr. Trotman, who has further improved on Porter's invention; and M. Martin, whose anchor is of very peculiar form, and is constructed so as to be self-canting, the arms revolving through an angle of 30° either way, and the sharp points of the flukes being always ready to enter the ground. — The anchor is said to be a-cock-bill when it is suspended vertically from the cat-head, ready to be let go; a-peak, when it is drawn in so tight as to bring the ship directly over it; a-trip or a-weigh, when it is just drawn out of the ground in a perpendicular direction; a-wash, when the stock is hove up to the surface of the water. — Floating anchor, an apparatus variously constructed, for being sunk below the swell of the sea, where there is no anchorage, to prevent a vessel from drifting.—Foul anchor. See FOUL, a. — Mooring anchor, a large heavy mass placed at the bottom of the water, in a harbour or roadstead, to which ships may be attached by a cable. —To back an anchor. See under BACK, v. t. —To cat the anchor, to draw the anchor perpendicularly up to the cat-head by a strong tackle called the cat.—To fish the anchor, to hoist and draw up the flukes of a ship's anchor towards the top of the bow by a machine called a fish, in order to stow it after it has been catted.—To weigh the anchor, to heave or raise it from the ground. 2. Something serving a purpose analogous to that of a ship's anchor; as, (a) the apparatus at the opposite end of the field from the engine of a steam-plough, and to which pulleys are fixed, round which the endless band or rope that moves the plough passes. (b) The means by which the extremities of the chains or wire-ropes of a suspension bridge are attached to the shore.—3. Fig. that which gives stability or security; that on which we place dependence for safety.

Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast. Heb. vi. 19.

4. In arch. an ornament shaped somewhat like an anchor or arrow-head. It is used along with the egg ornament, and the combination is popularly called egg-and-dart or egg-and-tongue. See ECHINUS, 4. — Anchor escapement. See ESCAPEMENT.

Anchor (ang'kėr), v. t. 1. To hold at rest by lowering the anchor; to place at anchor; as, to anchor a ship.—2. Fig. to fix or fasten on; to fix in a stable condition.

Let us anchor our hopes . . . upon his goodness. South.

Anchor (ang'kėr), v. i. 1. To cast anchor; to come to anchor; as, our ship anchored off the Isle of Wight.—2. Fig. to keep hold in any way.

Posthumus anchors upon Imogen. Shak.

Anchor† (ang'kėr), n. Same as Anchoret.

An anchor's cheer in prison be my scope! Shak.

Anchorable (ang'kėr-a-bl), a. Fit for anchorage. 'The sea everywhere twenty leagues from land anchorable.' Sir T. Herbert.

Anchorage (ang'kėr-āj), n. 1. Anchoring ground; a place where a ship can anchor, where the ground is not too rocky, nor the water too deep nor too shallow.

The fleet returned to its former anchorage. Southey.

2. The hold of a ship at anchor.

If that supposal should fail us, all our anchorage were loose, and we should but wander in a wild sea. Wotton.

3. The anchor and all the necessary tackle for anchoring. [Rare.]

The bark that hath discharged her fraught,
Returns with precious lading to the bay
From whence, at first, she weighed her anchorage. Shak.

4. A duty imposed on ships for anchoring in a harbour.

This corporation, otherwise a poor one, holds also the anchorage in the harbour. Rich. Carew.

Anchor-ball (ang'kėr-bąl), n. A pyrotechnical combustible attached to a grapnel for adhering to and setting fire to ships.

Anchor-bolt (ang'kėr-bōlt), n. A bolt with an expanded shank to prevent its being drawn out. E. H. Knight.

Anchor-chock (ang'kėr-chok), n. A piece indented into a wooden anchor-stock where it has become worn or defective; also, a piece of wood or iron on which an anchor rests when it is stowed.

Anchor-drag (ang'kėr-drag), n. Same as Drag-sheet.

Anchored (ang'kėrd), p. and a. 1. Held at rest by an anchor.—2. Shaped like an anchor; fluked; forked.

Her anchored tongue Threatening her venomed teeth. Dr. H. More.

Anchored.

3. In her. the term applied to a cross whose extremities are turned back like the flukes of an anchor: in this sense written also Anchry, Ancrée, Ancred.

Anchoress, Anchoritess (ang'kō-res, ang'kō-rit-es), n. A female anchoret.

And there a saintly anchoress she dwelt. Wordsworth.

Pega, his sister, an anchoritess, led a solitary life. Fuller.

Anchoret, Anchorite (ang'kō-ret, ang'kō-rīt), n. [L. anachoreta; Gr. anachorētes—ana, back, and chōreō, to make room for, retire, from chōros, a place.] A hermit; a recluse; one who retires from society into a desert or solitary place, to avoid the temptations of the world and devote himself to religious duties; specifically, a monk who, with the leave of the abbot, retires to a cave or cell, with an allowance from the monastery, to live in solitude. 'Macarius, the great Egyptian anchoret.' Abp. Usher.

Our Saviour himself . . . did not choose an anchorite's or a monastic life, but a social and affable way of conversing with mortals. Boyle.

Anchoretic, Anchoretical (ang-kō-ret'ik, ang-kō-ret'ik-al), a. Pertaining to a hermit, or his mode of life.

Anchor-gate (ang'kėr-gāt), n. A heavy gate such as is used in canals, having for its upper bearing a collar embedded in the adjacent masonry.

Anchor-hold (ang'kėr-hōld), n. The hold or fastness of an anchor; security. 'The one and only assurance and fast anchor-hold of our souls' health.' Camden.

Anchor-ice (ang'kėr-īs), n. The ice which is formed on and incrusts the beds of lakes and rivers; ground-ice.

Anchoring (ang'kėr-ing), p. and a. Held at rest by the anchor; riding or lying at anchor. 'Yon tall anchoring bark.' Shak.

Anchorite, n. See ANCHORET.

Anchoritess, n. See ANCHORESS.

Anchoritical (ang-kō-rit'ik-al), a. Pertaining to an anchorite or hermit, or to his mode of life.

Anchor-lining (ang'kėr-līn-ing), n. Same as Bill-boards. See BILL-BOARD.

Anchor-tripper (ang'kėr-trip-ėr), n. A device for tripping or casting loose a ship's anchor.

Anchor-watch (ang'kėr-woch), n. Naut. a subdivision of the watch kept constantly on deck during the time the ship lies at single anchor, to be in readiness to hoist jib or stay sails to keep the ship clear of her anchor, or to veer more cable, or let go another anchor in case she should drive or part her anchor. This watch is also in readiness to avoid collision in close rivers, by veering cable, setting sail, using the helm, &c.

Anchovy (an-chō'vi), n. [Pg. and Sp. anchova, an anchovy, referred by Mahn to Basque anchua, anchuva, dry.] An abdominal malacopterygious fish of the genus Engraulis, family Clupeidæ. The species are all of diminutive size, and, with exception of the common anchovy (E. encrasicholus) and E. meletta (both Mediterranean species), inhabitants of the tropical seas of India and America. The common anchovy, so esteemed for its rich and peculiar flavour, is not much larger than the middle finger. It is caught in vast numbers in the Mediterranean, and pickled for exportation. A sauce, held in much esteem, is made from anchovies by pounding them in water, simmering the mixture for a short time, adding a little cayenne pepper, and straining the whole through a hair-sieve.

Anchovy-pear (an-chō'vi-pār), n. A fruit of Jamaica, produced by a species of the genus Grias (G. cauliflora). It is large, and contains generally a single seed protected by a stony covering. It is pickled and eaten like mango.

Anchry (ang'kri), a. In her. same as Anchored, 3.

Anchusa (ang-kū'sa), n. [Gr. angchousa, alkanet.] A genus of plants, nat. order Boraginaceæ. The species are chiefly inhabitants of the temperate parts of the earth, either on the mountains of tropical climates or the temperate zones. A. officinalis (common alkanet or bugloss) and A. sempervirens are inhabitants of Britain. The Anchusa tinctoria of some botanists is the same as Alkanna tinctoria. See ALKANET.

Anchusin, Anchusine (ang-kū'sin), n. The name given to a red colouring matter obtained from Anchusa (Alkanna) tinctoria. It is resinous, and emits violet vapours when heated.

Anchylose (ang'ki-lōs), v. t. A common, but erroneous, spelling of Ankylose (which see).

Anchylosed (ang'ki-lōst), p. Same as Ankylosed.

Anchylosis (ang-ki-lō'sis), n. Same as Ankylosis.

Anchylotic (ang-ki-lot'ik), a. Same as Ankylotic.

Anciency† (ān'shen-si), n. Antiquity.

Ancient (ān'shent), a. [Fr. ancien, Pr. ancian, L.L. antianus, from L. ante, before. See ANTE.] 1. That happened or existed in former times, usually at a great distance of time; associated with, or bearing marks of, antiquity; of long standing; old: as opposed to modern; as, ancient authors; ancient records.—2. Having lasted from a remote period; having been of long duration; of great age; old; as, an ancient city; an ancient forest: generally, but not always, applied to things.

And hence arises ancient men's report,
That days are tedious, and that years are short.
Crabbe.

3. Past; former.

If I longer stay,
We shall begin our ancient bickerings. Shak.

—Ancient, Old, Antique, Antiquated, Obsolete. Ancient and old are generally applied only to things subject to decay. We do not say the old or ancient sun, stars, angels, nor an old river or mountain. Old refers to the duration of the thing itself; ancient, to the period with which it is associated. An old dress, custom, &c., is one which has lasted a long time, and which still exists; an ancient dress, custom, &c., is one which prevailed in former ages, and in idea is still associated with them, but which may or may not now exist. An old-looking man is one apparently advanced in years; an ancient-looking man, one whose quaint appearance is suggestive of bygone ages. We may apply, therefore, either adjective to an object still existing, as we may regard its age or its associations. Thus we may say an old picture, statue, author (regarding the last as living in his works), or an ancient picture, &c. When the object no longer exists we more properly use ancient; as, the ancient republics of Greece and Rome. Ancient is opposed to modern; old, to young, new, fresh. Antique is applied to style or fashion. An ancient temple is one built by the ancients; an antique temple is one built in the style of the ancients. Antiquated is old, opposed to what is in fashion or established by custom; obsolete, out of use, opposed to what is current, as language, statutes, &c.—SYN. Old, primitive, pristine, antique, antiquated, old-fashioned, obsolete.

Ancient (ān'shent), n. [See the adjective.] 1. One who lived in former ages; a person living at an early period of the world's history: generally used in the plural, and as opposed to moderns.—2. A very old man; and hence an elder or person of influence; a governor or ruler, political or ecclesiastical.

The Lord will enter into judgment with the ancients of his people. Is. iii. 14.

3.† A senior. 'In Christianity they were his ancients.' Hooker.—4. In the Inns of Court and Chancery, one having a certain standing or seniority; thus in Gray's Inn the society consists of benchers, ancients, barristers, and students under the bar, the ancients being of the oldest barristers. Wharton.—Ancient of days, the Almighty in reference to his existence from eternity.

I beheld till the thrones were cast down, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow. Dan. vii. 9.

—Council of ancients, in French hist. one of the two assemblies composing the legislative body in 1795. It consisted of 250 members, each of whom was at least forty years of age. It was put an end to by the revolution of 18th Brumaire (9th Nov. 1799).

Ancient† (ān'shent), n. [Corrupted from ensign (which see).] 1. A flag, banner, or standard; an ensign, especially the flag or streamer of a ship. 'More dishonourable ragged, than an old faced (that is, patched up) ancient.' Shak.—2. The bearer of a flag; a standard-bearer; an ensign.

This is Othello's ancient, as I take it. Shak.

Anciently (ān'shent-li), adv. In old times; in times long since past; as, Rome was anciently more populous than at present.

The colewort is not an enemy, though that were anciently received, to the vine only; but it is an enemy to any other plant. Bacon.

Ancientness (ān'shent-nes), n. The state of being ancient; antiquity; existence from old times. Dryden.

Ancientry (ān'shent-ri), n. 1. Dignity of birth; the honour of ancient lineage. 'His father being a gentleman of more ancientry than estate.' Fuller.—2. Character or imitation of antiquity; something belonging to ancient times.

They (the last lines) contain not one word of ancientry. West.

Ancienty† (ān'shent-i), n. Age; antiquity; ancientness; seniority. 'Of ancienty above a thousand years ago.' Dr. Martin.

Ancile (an-sī'le), n. [L.] Among the ancient Romans, the sacred shield of Mars, said to have fallen from heaven, or one of the shields made in imitation of it.

Ancillary (an'sil-la-ri), a. [L. ancillaris, from ancilla, a maid-servant.] Subservient, as a maid-servant; aiding; auxiliary; subordinate.

The convocation of York seems to have been always considered as inferior, and even ancillary, to the greater province. Hallam.

Ancille,† n. [L. ancilla, a maid-servant.] A maid-servant. Chaucer.

Ancipital, Ancipitous (an-sip'it-al, an-sip'-it-us), a. [L. anceps, ancipitis, two-headed, ambiguous—an for amb, on both sides, and caput, the head.] Doubtful or double; ambiguous; double-faced or double-formed.—Ancipitous stem, in bot. a two-edged stem, compressed and forming two opposite thin edges like the stem of the iris.

Ancle (ang'kl), n. Same as Ankle.

Ancome (an'kum), n. [A. Sax. an-cuman, to come on or in; comp. Sc. income.] A small ulcerous swelling arising suddenly.

Ancon (an'kon), n. pl. Ancones (an-kō'nēz). [L. ancon, Gr. angkōn, the elbow.] 1. In anat. the olecranon; the upper end of the ulna or elbow.—2. A carved drinking-cup or horn.—3. In arch. a console, cantilever, corbel, or other stone projection contrived for supporting cornices or other structural parts of a building. The projections cut upon the key-stones of arches to support busts or other ornaments are ancones.

Ancon (an'kon), n. The name of a celebrated breed of sheep in Massachusetts, with short crooked legs and long back like a turnspit, and hence unable to leap fences. They originated in 1791 from a ram of this shape expressly selected to found a breed free from this vicious propensity so annoying to American farmers. Called also the Otter Breed.

Anconal (an-kō'nal), a. Pertaining to the ancon or elbow.

Anconeus (an-kō-nē'us), n. A name given to any of the muscles attached to the ancon or olecranon.

Anconoid (an'kon-oid), a. [Gr. angkōn, the elbow, and eidos, likeness.] Elbow-like: applied to a process of the forearm.

Ancony (an'kō-ni), n. [Probably from Gr. angkōn, the elbow, from its resemblance to the arm.] In iron-work, a piece of half-wrought iron in the shape of a bar in the middle, but rude and unwrought at the ends. A piece of cast-iron is melted off and hammered at a forge into a mass of 2 feet long and square, which is called a bloom; then carried to a finery, and worked into an ancony.

Ancylotome (an-sil'ō-tōm), n. [Gr. angkylē, a bend, and temnō, to cut.] In surg. a crooked knife or bistoury; also, a knife for dividing the frænum linguæ in tongue-tied persons, as well as other adhesions and contractions.

And (and), conj. [A. Sax. and, ond, O.E. and, ant, an, D. en, ende, G. und, O.H.G. anti, all signifying and; Icel. enda, and yet, and if, en, but. This word is probably really the same as that treated in next article.] A particle joining words and sentences, and expressing the relations of connection or addition. In Scripture especially it often opens a narrative, where the connection with anything going before is not obvious; thus, 'And the Lord called unto Moses,' Num. i. 1; Ex. xxiv. 1. It is also sometimes used as a particle introducing interrogative and other clauses, expressive of surprise, or surprise conjoined with incredulity, joy, indignation; as, And shall I see him again? And you dare thus address me! It is also found used by a Latinism for both; as, 'thrones and civil and divine.' Sylvester, Du Bartas. By the figure hendiadys it is made to connect two notions of which the one is modificatory of the other, both together forming a single idea; as, with dances and delight = delightful dances; 'The tediousness and process of my travel' (= tedious process); 'Thy fair and outward character' (= outwardly fair). Shak. In old popular songs it is sometimes a mere redundant expletive; 'when that I was and a tiny little boy.' Shak. [In and if, and is the word treated in next article.]

And† (and), conj. [This word may be the same as and the connecting conjunction, only used with a different meaning, or an, and, if, may be a distinct word, in which case an is the proper form; comp. A. Sax. ono, if, Goth. an, L. an, interrogative particles.] If. 'And I suffer this, may I go graze.' Beau. & Fl. [In older writers it was frequently used redundantly before if. 'But and if that servant say.' Luke xii. 45.]

Anda (an'da), n. A genus of plants, nat. order Euphorbiaceæ, the only known species of which, A. braziliensis, is a Brazilian tree with large yellow flowers, and an angular fruit about the size of an orange, containing two rounded seeds like small chestnuts. The seeds yield a fine drying oil, and are strongly cathartic, and the green outer portion or rind of the shell is astringent, and used in diarrhœa.

Andabatism† (an'da-ba-tizm), n. [L. andabata, a gladiator who fought blindfolded.] Uncertainty; ambiguity; doubt. Shelford.

Andalusite (an-da-lū'sīt), n. A pellucid mineral of the garnet family, of a gray, green, bluish, flesh or rose-red colour; sometimes found crystallized in imperfect four-sided prisms, nearly or quite rhombic; consisting of anhydrous silicate of alumina with iron peroxide. Its hardness is nearly equal to that of corundum. It has its name from Andalusia in Spain, where it was first discovered.

Andante (an-dän'tā), a. [It. andánte, walking moderately, from andare, to go.] In music, moving with a moderate, even, graceful, onward progression.

Andante (an-dän'tā), n. In music, a movement or piece composed in andante time; as, the andante in Beethoven's fifth symphony.

Andantino (an-dan-tē'no), a. [It.] In music, applied to a movement quicker than andante.

Andaquies-wax (an-da-kē'ās-waks), n. The wax of a bee found near the Orinoco and Amazon rivers, and used as a substitute for ordinary bees'-wax in making candles, &c.

Andarac (an'da-rak), n. [Corruption of Sandarac.] Red orpiment.

Andean (an-dē'an), a. Pertaining to the Andes, the great chain of mountains extending through South America.

Andesin (an'dēz-in), n. A mineral resembling felspar in external appearance, but differing from it essentially in composition. It contains 60 per cent. silica, 25 alumina, 7 soda, 6 lime, 1 potash, and 1 magnesia. It was originally obtained from the Andes, but has since been found in the Vosges and other localities.

Andesite (an'dēz-īt), n. A name given by Gustavus Rose to a trachytic rock of the Andes, containing andesin, glassy felspar (orthoclase), and hornblende, disseminated through a dark-coloured base.

Andira (an-dī'ra), n. [Brazilian name of the cabbage-tree.] A genus of trees, nat. order Leguminosæ, with fleshy plum-like fruits. The wood is well fitted for building. One species is the A. inermis, or cabbage-tree, the bark of which is narcotic, and is used as an anthelminthic in medicine under the name of Worm-bark.

Andira-guacu (an-dē'ra-gwä'kų), n. In South America, the popular name of the vampyre-bat (Vampyrus spectrum).

Andiron (and'i-ėrn), n. [Probably for wend-iron—wend, to turn, and iron. Wedgwood Ancient Andirons, from Cobham, Kent.

adduces in favour of this etymology the Fl. wendijser, the iron on which the spit turns. Others suggest hand-iron, end-iron.] A horizontal iron bar raised on short legs, with an upright standard at one end, used to support pieces of wood when burning on an open hearth, one being placed on each side of the hearth. The standards usually ended with a round knob at top, and were kept brightly polished; those for kitchen use had catches for holding the roasting-spit; others were richly ornamented with copper and silver work.

Her andirons
(I had forgot them) were two winking Cupids
Of silver, each on one foot standing, nicely
Depending on their brands. Shak.

Called also Fire-dog and End-iron.

Andra (an'dra), n. A North African species of gazelle.

Andranatomy (an-dra-nat'o-mi), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and anatomē, dissection.] The dissection of a human body, especially of a male; androtomy.

Andreæaceæ (an-drē'ē-ā"sē-ē), n. pl. [After J. Andreæ, a German botanist.] A nat. order, or, according to some, a distinct tribe of mosses. They do not, however, differ essentially from the true mosses, being distinguished mainly by the longitudinal splitting of the valves at maturity. The plants are mostly alpine, and four are found in Britain. All the species are of a peculiar dark hue, and the leaves, which are of a close texture, are of a beautiful yellow or golden brown under the microscope.

Andrenidæ (an-dren'i-dē), n. pl. [Typical genus Andrena, from Gr. anthrēnē, a bee.] A family of solitary bees in which the tongue is short and the chin elongated. The female forms burrows in sandy ground, provisioning them with pollen and honey, in the midst of which she deposits her eggs. Every nest contains several such masses, each provided with an egg, and separated from its neighbours by small partitions of earth. The Andrenidæ consist only of males and females.

Andreolite (an'dre-o-līt), n. A mineral, harmotome or cross-stone. See CROSS-STONE.

Andrœcium (an-drē'si-um), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, a male, and oikos, a house.] In bot. the male system of a flower; the assemblage of the stamens.

Androgynal, Androgynous (an-droj'in-al, an-droj'in-us), a. [Gr. androgynos—common to man and woman—anēr, andros, a man, and gynē, woman.] 1. Having two sexes; being male and female; hermaphroditical. (a) In bot. having male and female flowers in the same inflorescence, as in some species of Carex. (b) In zool. applied to animals with both sexes in the same individual, as the snail.—2. Having or partaking of the mental characteristics of both sexes.

The truth is, a great mind must be androgynous. Coleridge.

Androgynally (an-droj'in-al-li), adv. With the parts of both sexes. Sir T. Browne.

Androgyne† (an-drō-jin'), n. [Fr., from Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and gynē, a woman.] An hermaphrodite.

Plato . . . tells a story how that at first there were three kinds of men, that is, male, female, and a third mixt species of the other two, called, for that reason, androgynes. Chilmead.

What shall I say of these vile and stinking androgynes, that is to say, these men-women, with their curled locks, their crisped and frizzled hair? Harmar.

Android, Androides (an'droid, an-droi'dēz), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and eidos, form.] A machine in the human form, which, by certain springs, imitates some of the natural motions of a living man.

Andromeda (an-drom'e-da), n. [Andromeda, daughter of Cepheus king of Ethiopia, and wife of Perseus; after death placed as a constellation in the heavens.] 1. A northern constellation, behind Pegasus, Cassiopeia, and Perseus, supposed to represent the figure of a woman chained. The stars in this constellation in Flamsteed's catalogue are eighty-four.—2. A genus of plants, nat. order Ericaceæ. The species are hardy shrubs or trees, natives of Europe, Asia, and North America. A. polifolia is found in peat bogs in Britain; it is an acrid narcotic, hurtful to sheep. Narcotic properties have also been observed in several foreign species. A. floribunda is an evergreen ornamental shrub cultivated in gardens.

Andron (an'drōn), n. [Gr. andrōn, from anēr, andros, a man.] In Greek antiq. the apartment in a dwelling-house appropriated to males. It was in the lower part of the house.

Andropetalous (an-drō-pet'al-us), a. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and petalon, a petal.] In bot. an epithet applied to double flowers produced by the conversion of the stamens into petals, as in the garden ranunculus.

Androphagi (an-drof'a-jī), n. pl. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and phagō, to eat.] Man-eaters; anthropophagi.

Androphagous (an-drof'a-gus), a. Pertaining or addicted to cannibalism.

Androphore (an'dro-fōr), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and pherō, to bear.] 1. In bot. a stalk supporting the stamens, often formed by a union of the filaments.—2. In zool. the medusiform zoöid in which the male elements are developed, and which differs in form from the gynophore, or that bearing the female elements.

Andropogon (an-drō-pō'gōn), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and pōgōn, the beard.] A large genus of grasses, mostly natives of warm countries. A lemon-scented fragrant oil is yielded by A. Schœnanthus, the sweet-scented ginger or lemon-grass of Malabar and our conservatories. A. muricatus, the Indian khus, is used to make covers for palanquins, screens, &c., and yields a fragrant attar called khus-khus. Ginger-grass oil is obtained from A. Nardus.

Androsphinx (an'drō-sfingks), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and sphingx, a sphinx.] In Egyptian Androsphinx.

anc. sculp. a sphinx with a human head, as distinguished from one with the head of a ram or a hawk. See SPHINX.

Androspore (an'drō-spōr), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and sporē, seed.] In bot. a spore of some algæ, from which proceed a large number of small bodies having male functions.

Androtomy (an-drot'o-mi), n. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man, and tomē, a cutting.] Dissection of the human body, as distinguished from zootomy.

Androus (an'drus), a. [Gr. anēr, andros, a man.] In bot. producing stamens only, without pistils; staminate; male.

Aneal† (a-nēl'), v.t. Same as Anele.

Anear (a-nēr'), adv. or prep. Near.

Dark-browed sophist, come not anear. Tennyson.

Much more is needed, so that at last the measure of misery anear us may be correctly taken. Is. Taylor.

Anecdotage (an'ek-dōt-āj), n. 1. Anecdotes collectively; matter of the nature of anecdotes. [Rare.]

All history, therefore, being built partly, and some of it altogether, upon anecdotage, must be a tissue of lies. De Quincey.

2. [With a punning allusion to dotage.] The later part of one's life, when he is supposed to be garrulous and fond of telling anecdotes. [Colloq.]

Anecdotal (an'ek-dōt-al), a. Pertaining to or consisting of anecdotes. 'Conversation, argumentative or declamatory, narrative or anecdotal.' Prof. Wilson.

Anecdote (an'ek-dōt), n. [Gr. anekdotos, not published—a, neg., ek, out, and dotos, given, from didōmi, to give.] A short story or narrative, being the relation of a particular or detached incident or fact of an interesting nature; a biographical incident; a single passage of private life.—Anecdote, Story. An anecdote is the relation of an interesting or amusing incident, generally of a private nature, and is always reported as true. A story may be true or fictitious, and generally has reference to a series of incidents so arranged and related as to be entertaining.

Anecdotic, Anecdotical (an-ek-dot'ik, an-ek-dot'ik-al), a. Pertaining to anecdotes; consisting of or of the nature of anecdotes; anecdotal. 'Anecdotical traditions, whose authority is unknown.' Bolingbroke.

Anecdotist (an'ek-dōt-ist), n. One who deals in anecdotes.

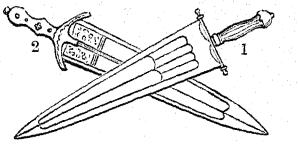
Anelace, Anlace (an'e-lās, an'lās), n. [Possibly O.H.G. an, on, and laz, the side.] A broad knife or dagger, from 18 inches to 2 feet long, worn at the girdle. It appears to have been used from an early period.



1, Anelace (time of Edward IV.). 2, Anelace (time of Henry VII.).

Anele† (a-nēl'), v.t. pret. & pp. aneled; ppr. aneling. [A. Sax. onelan, to anoint—prefix on, and ele, œl, oil.] To administer extreme unction to.

He was housled and aneled, and had all that a Christian man ought to have. Morte d'Arthur.

Anelectric (an-ē-lek'trik), a. [Gr. an, priv., and E. electric (which see).] Having no electric properties; non-electric.

Anelectrode (an-ē-lek'trōd), n. The positive pole of a galvanic battery. See ELECTRODE.

Anemograph (a-nem'o-graf), n. [Gr. anemos, the wind, and graphō, to write, to describe.] An instrument for measuring and recording the force and direction of the wind.

Anemography (an-e-mog'ra-fi), n. [See ANEMOGRAPH.] A description of the winds.

Anemology (an-e-mol'o-ji), n. [Gr. anemos, wind, and logos, discourse.] The doctrine of or a treatise on winds.

Anemometer (an-e-mom'et-ėr), n. [Gr. anemos, wind, and metron, a measure.] An instrument or machine for measuring the force and velocity of the wind. There are various kinds of anemometers, as Lind's, Osler's, Robinson's. Casella, by an elaborate combination of Robinson's, with some more recent modifications, has produced an instrument capable of registering the direction and velocity of the wind with greater precision than any of its predecessors. The engraving shows Robinson's anemometer in its simplest form. Four hemispherical hollow cups A A are extended upon strong metal arms, with their concave surfaces facing the same way, upon a vertical axis B, which has at its lower extremity an endless screw D. The axis is strengthened and supported at C. The endless screw is placed in gear with a train of wheel-work; and the indication is given by a hand which moves round a dial, or, in some instruments, by several hands moving round different dials like those of a gas-meter.

Anemometry (an-e-mom'et-ri), n. The process of determining the pressure or force of the wind by means of an anemometer.

Anemone (a-nem'o-ne), n. [Gr. anemōnē, the wind-flower, from anemos, the wind: so named from being easily stripped of its petals by the wind.] Wind-flower, a genus of plants, nat. order Ranunculaceæ. Three species occur in Britain. The wood anemone (A. nemorosa) is the only one truly native; it has white flowers, sometimes tinged with purple on the outside. A. ranunculoides, a common European plant, naturalized in a few places in Britain, has bright yellow flowers, but is otherwise like the wood anemone. A. apennina, a native of southern Europe, also naturalized in a few British localities, has the flowers bright blue on the inside of the sepals, which are narrow and more numerous than in the other two; the root-stalk is also shorter and thicker. Some species are cultivated in gardens for their elegant double flowers. A. vitifolia, vine-leaved anemone, a native of Nepal, with its charming foliage and the freshness of its large pure white flower, is one of the loveliest of all our garden plants. —Sea-anemone. See ACTINIA.

Vine-leaved Anemone (A. vitifolia).

Anemonic (an-e-mon'ik), a. Of or pertaining to anemone; obtained from anemonin; as, anemonic acid, an acid obtained by the action of baryta upon anemonin.

Anemonin, Anemonine (a-nem'o-nin), n. A crystalline substance extracted from some species of anemone.

Anemony (a-nem'o-ni) n. Same as Anemone.

Anemophilous (an-e-mof'il-us), a. [Gr. anemos, the wind, and phileō, to love.] Lit. loving the wind; specifically, in bot. denominative of flowers whose pollen is conveyed from the anther to the stigma by the agency of the wind: contradistinguished from entomophilous (which see). Sachs.

Anemoscope (a-nem'o-skōp), n. [Gr. anemos, wind, and skopeō, to view.] A contrivance which shows the direction of the wind; a weathercock; a wind-vane; especially, a contrivance for conveying the indications of the vane to a dial in a chamber on the ground.

Anemosis (an-ē-mō'sis), n. [Gr. anemos, the wind.] In bot. the condition of being wind-shaken: an occasional condition of the timber of exogenous trees, in which the annual layers are separated from each other, caused, it is supposed, by the action of strong gales. Many doubt, however, whether the condition is due to wind, and believe that it should be referred rather to frost or lightning.

An-end (an-end'), a. [An, on, and end.] 1. On end; in an upright position. 'Make . . each particular hair to stand an-end.' Shak. [Hardly used now except as a nautical term.]—2.† Lastly.

Anenst (a-nenst'), prep. [O.E. and Sc.] Same as Anent. 'And right anenst him a dog snarling.' B. Jonson.

Anent (a-nent'), prep. [Also written anentis, anenst, in O.E. anence, anendes, anent, anen, from A. Sax. on efn, on emn; that is, on even. Comp. G. an eban (lit. on even), neben, nebent, by the side of. The termination is similar to that in against, amongst.] 1. Opposite; over against; as, he lives anent the town-house. [Provincial English and Scotch.]—2. About; respecting. [Old English and Scotch.]

I cannot but pass you my judgment anent those six considerations which you offered to invalidate those authorities that I so much reverence. King Charles I.

Anent is a Scotch word which has been made English by the Scotch novels. Byron.

Anentera (an-en'tėr-a), n. pl. [See ANENTEROUS.] An obsolete name for the Infusoria, from a belief that they had several stomachs round the mouth but no intestines.

Anenterous (an-en'tėr-us), a. [Gr. an, priv., and entera, bowels, from entos, within.] Destitute of intestines; having no alimentary canal.

Such species have no intestines, no anus, and are said to be anenterous. Owen.

Aneroid (an'ē-roid), n. Same as Android (which see).

Aneroid (an'ē-roid), a. [Gr. a, priv., nēros, moisture, and eidos, form; from containing no mercury or other fluid.] Dispensing with fluid, as with quicksilver.—Aneroid barometer, an instrument for indicating the pressure of the atmosphere, the invention of M. Vidi of Paris, for whom a patent was obtained in England by M. Fontaine-Moreau in 1844. It answers the purpose of the ordinary mercurial barometer, but less perfectly. It is, however, very handy and portable. The engraving represents the latest improved mechanism of an aneroid. The outer casing and face of the instrument are removed, but the index-hand is left attached to the arbor F. A is the corrugated vacuum box, which has been exhausted of air through the tube J. B is a powerful spring resting in gudgeons fixed in the base-plate, and attached to a socket behind F. A lever C, joined to the edge of the spring B, is connected by the bent lever at D with the chain E, the other end of which is coiled round the arbor F. As the box A is compressed by the weight of the atmosphere increasing, the spring B is tightened, the lever C depressed, and the chain E uncoiled from F, which is thereby turned so that the hand H moves to the right. In the meanwhile the spiral spring G, coiled round F, is compressed. When, therefore, the pressure decreases, A and B relax by virtue of their elasticity; E slackens, G unwinds, turning F, which carries the index-hand H to the left.

Anes (ānz, also yins), adv. Once. [Scotch.]

Anes-errand (ānz-er'rand), adv. Of set purpose; as, or on, a sole errand; entirely on purpose. [Scotch.]

Anesthesia (an-es-thē'si-a), n. Same as Anæsthesia.

Anesthetic (an-es-thet'ik), a. Same as Anæsthetic.

Anethum (a-nē'thum), n. [Gr. ana, and aithō, to burn.] A genus of plants, nat. order Umbelliferæ. A. graveolens is the common dill. See DILL.

Aneuch (a-nūch'), a. adv. or n. Enough. [Scotch.]

Aneurism (an'ū-rizm), n. [Gr. aneurysma, aneurysmos, a widening—ana, up, and eurys, wide.] In med. the swelling of an artery, or the dilatation and expansion of some part of an artery. Aneurisms arise partly from the too violent motion of the blood, partly from excessive debility of the membranes of the artery, which is sometimes constitutional. They are therefore more frequent in the great branches of the arteries; in particular, in the vicinity of the heart, in the arch of the aorta, and in the extremities, for instance, in the ham and at the ribs, where the arteries are exposed to frequent injuries by stretching, violent bodily exertions, thrusts, falls, and contusions.

Aneurismal (an-ū-riz'mal), a. Pertaining to an aneurism; as, an aneurismal tumour.

Anew (a-nū'), adv. [Prefix a, of or on, and new.] Over again; in a new form; afresh; as, to arm anew; to create anew.

Anfractuose (an-frak'tū-ōs), a. [See ANFRACTUOUS.] In bot. twisted or sinuous, as the anther of a cucumber.

Anfractuosity (an-frak'tū-os"i-ti), n. 1. A state of being anfractuous or full of windings and turnings. 'The anfractuosities of his intellect and temper.' Macaulay.—2. In anat. a sinuous depression like the depressions separating the convolutions of the brain.

Anfractuous (an-frak'tū-us), a. [L. anfractus, broken or bent round—an for amb, round, and frango, fractum, to break.] Winding; full of windings and turnings; sinuous. 'The anfractuous passages of the brain.' Smith.

Anfractuousness (an-frak'tū-us-nes), n. The state of being anfractuous.

Anfracture † (an-frak-tūr), n. A mazy winding. Bailey.

Angariation † (an-gā'ri-ā"shon), n. [L.L. angariatio, business, from Gr. anggareia, the service of the anggaros, a mounted courier in Persia for carrying the royal despatches. A word of Persian origin.] Effort; exertion; toil.

The earth yields us fruit, . . . not without much cost and angariation, requiring both our labour and patience. Bp. Hall.

Angel (ān'jel), n. [L. angelus, Gr. anggelos, a messenger, from anggellō, to tell or announce.] 1. A messenger.

The dear good angel of the spring,
The nightingale. B. Jonson.

2. A spiritual being employed by God in human affairs: usually applied to a good spirit, but sometimes to an evil spirit.

Angels are bright still, though the brightest fell. Shak.

They had a king over them, which is the angel of the bottomless pit. Rev. ix. 11.

3. A person, generally a woman, of adorable qualities.

Sir, as I have a soul, she is an angel. Shak.

4. A gold coin, formerly current in England, varying in value from 6*s.* 8*d.* to 10*s.*, so called from its bearing on its obverse a figure of the archangel Michael piercing a dragon. It continued to be coined down to the time of the Commonwealth.

Angel of Queen Elizabeth.

Cousin, away for England; haste before, and, ere our coming, see thou shake the bags of hoarding abbots; angels imprisoned set thou at liberty. Shak.

Angel (ān'jel), a. Resembling angels; angelic. 'In angel whiteness.' Shak.

Angelage (ān'jel-āj), n. Existence or state of angels. Beau. & Fl.

Angel-bed (ān'jel-bed), n. An open bed without posts.

Angelet (ān'jel-et), n. 1. An old English gold coin, equal to half an angel. See ANGELOT.—2. A little or young angel. [Rare.]

And with the noise of those subdued soundings the angelet sprang forth, fluttering its rudiments of pinions. Lamb.

Angel-fish (ān'jel-fish), n. A plagiostomous fish, Squatina angelus, nearly allied to the sharks, very ugly and voracious, preying on other fish. It is from 6 to 8 feet long, with a large head, teeth broad at the base, but slender and sharp above, disposed in five rows all around the jaws. The fish takes its name from its pectoral fins, which are very large, extending horizontally like wings when spread. This fish connects the genus of rays with that of sharks, partaking of the characters of both; but it differs from both in this, that its mouth is placed at the extremity of the head. It is common on the south coasts of Britain, and is also called Monk-fish and Fiddle-fish.

Angel-fish (Squatina angelus).

Angel-gold † (ān'jel-gōld), n. 1. Gold used for coining angels, of a finer quality than crown-gold.—2. Gold coin stamped with the figure of an angel.

Having angel-gold, strung on white ribbon, on his arm. Fuller.

Angelic, Angelical (an-jel'ik, an-jel'ik-al), a. Resembling or belonging to, or partaking of, or suitable to, the nature and dignity of angels.

Here, happy creature, fair angelic Eve. Milton.
Others more mild,
Retreated in a silent valley, sing,
With notes angelical to many a harp. Milton.

Angelica (an-jel'ik-a), n. [From the supposed angelic virtues possessed by some of the species, for not only were they believed to be a remedy against poison, the plague, all kinds of infection, and malaria, but they were believed to be invaluable against witchcraft and enchantments.] 1. A genus of umbelliferous plants found in the northern temperate regions and in New Zealand. One species, A. sylvestris, common in Britain, was formerly greatly prized for its supposed virtues. Its powdered seeds are used in some parts of Europe to kill lice, and its roots and seeds are used in preparing gin and bitters.—2. The garden name for Archangelica officinalis, a native of the banks of rivers and wet ditches in the northern parts of Europe, and found naturalized in similar situations in England. It has a large fleshy aromatic root, and a strong-furrowed branched stem as high as a man. It is cultivated on the Continent for the sake of its agreeable aromatic odour and carminative properties. Its blanched stems, candied with sugar, form a very agreeable sweetmeat, possessing tonic and stomachic qualities. The roots were formerly employed in scrofulous diseases, as diuretics and sudorifics.

Angelically (an-jel'ik-al-li), adv. In an angelic manner; like an angel.

Angelicalness (an-jel'ik-al-nes), n. The quality of being angelic; the nature or character of an angel; excellence more than human.

Angelica-tree (an-jel'ik-a-trē), n. The American name of Aralia spinosa, nat. order Araliaceæ (which see), a prickly, small, simple-stemmed tree, 8 to 12 feet high, the berries of which are used in an infusion of wine or spirits for relieving rheumatic pains and violent colic.

Angelicize (an-jel'i-sīz), v.t. To make angelic or like an angel.

Angelify (an-jel'i-fī), v.t. To make like an angel. 'The soul . . . refined and angelified.' Farringdon.

Angelite (ān'jel-īt), n. [So called from Angelium in Alexandria, where the first meetings were held.] Eccles. one of a sect of heretics near the close of the fifth century, who held the persons of the Trinity not to be the same, nor to exist by their own nature, but each to be a God, existing by participating of a deity common to them all.

Angelize (ān'jel-īz), v.t. To make an angel of; to raise to the state of an angel.

> David alone, whom with heav'n's love surpriz'd,
> To praise thee there, thou now hast angelitz'd.
> Sylvester, Du Bartas.

Angelology (ān-jel-ol'o-ji), n. [Angel, and Gr. logos.] A discourse on angels, or the doctrine of angelic beings. [Rare.]

> The same mythology commanded the general consent; the same angelology, demonology. Milman.

Angelophany (ān-jel-of'a-ni), n. [Angel, and Gr. phainō, to appear.] The manifestation of an angel or angels to man by actual appearance.

> If God seeks to commune more fully with a man, his messenger appears and speaks to him. The narratives of such angelophanies vary in detail.
> Prof. W. R. Smith.

Angelot (an'jel-ot), n. [Fr., from L.L. angelotus, dim. of L. angelus, an angel.] 1. An ancient English coin, of the value of half an angel, struck at Paris while under the dominion of England: so called from the figure of an angel supporting the escutcheon of the arms of England and France.—2. A small rich sort of cheese made in Normandy, so called because it formerly bore the figure of the coin, probably to indicate its price.—3. An instrument of music somewhat resembling a lute.

Angel-shot (ān'jel-shot), n. [Fr. ange, an angel, also a chain-shot. The latter sense is probably a grimly humorous modification of that of heavenly messenger.] Chain-shot (which see under CHAIN).

Angelus (an'jel-us), n. In the Rom. Cath. Ch. (a) a solemn devotion in memory of the incarnation, consisting mainly of versicles and responses, the angelic salutation three times repeated, and a collect, so named from the word with which it commences, 'Angelus Domini' (Angel of the Lord). (b) The bell tolled in the morning, at noon, and in the evening to indicate to the faithful the time when the angelus is to be recited.

Angel-water† (ān'jel-wą-tèr), n. A mixture of rose, orange-flower, and myrtle water, musk and ambergris, used as a perfume and cosmetic in the seventeenth century.

> I met the prettiest creature in New Spring Garden. . . . Angel-water was the worst scent about her.
> Sedley.

Anger (ang'gèr), n. [From a widely-spread root, ang, expressive of compression, tightness, and hence annoyance, distress. The word entered English apparently from the Scandinavian; comp. Icel. angr, grief, sorrow, angra, to grieve, annoy, or make angry; Dan. anger, sorrow, repentance; the same root also appears in A. Sax. ange, troubled; Goth. aggvus, G. enge, narrow; L. ango, to squeeze, to trouble, angor, vexation, angustus, narrow (whence anguish); Gr. anchō, to choke.] 1.† Pain or smart, as of a sore or swelling.

> I made the experiment, setting the moxa where the first violence of my pain began, and where the greatest anger and soreness still continued.
> Sir W. Temple.

2.† Grief; sorrow; trouble. [Old English.] 3. A violent passion or emotion of the mind, excited by a real or supposed injury to one's self or others.

> Anger is, according to some, a transient hatred, or at least very like it. South.

4.† An individual fit of anger; an expression of anger, as a threat: in this sense it may be used in the plural.

> Whose voices, angers, and terrors, and sometimes howlings also, he said he often heard. Abp. Usher.

—Anger, Wrath. Anger is a sudden, keen feeling of displeasure arising from injury, real or supposed, done to ourselves or others. It is not necessarily accompanied by any outward manifestation. Wrath is a stronger feeling of this nature, and is accompanied by external signs and a desire to take vengeance. Wrath often implies a forgetfulness of the consequences to ourselves and others of what we do while under its influence.—SYN. Resentment, wrath, rage, fury, passion, ire, gall, choler, indignation, displeasure, vexation, grudge, spleen.

Anger (ang'gèr), v.t. 1. To make painful; to cause to smart; to inflame; as, to anger an ulcer. Bacon.—2. To excite to anger; to rouse resentment in.

> There were some late taxes and impositions introduced, which rather angered than grieved the people.
> Clarendon.

SYN. To irritate, enrage, inflame, provoke, exasperate, rouse, incite.

Angerly (ang'gèr-li), adv. In an angry manner; angrily.

> Then in madness and in bliss,
> If my lips should dare to kiss
> Thy taper fingers amorously,
> Again thou blushest angerly. Tennyson.

Angerness† (ang'gèr-nes), n. The state of being angry. 'Hail, innocent of angerness.' MS. cited by T. Warton.

Angina (an'ji-na or an-jī'na), n. [L. angina, quinsy, from ango, to choke. See ANGER.] In med. severe sore throat; quinsy.—Angina pectoris, a painful disease associated with some heart trouble, characterized by an extremely acute constriction felt generally at the lower part of the sternum, and extending along the whole side of the chest and into the corresponding arm. It is usually brought on by violent exercise, excessive eating, or strong mental emotion, and has been known to result from excessive use of tobacco. It often proves fatal. Called also Breast-pang.

Angiocarpous (an'ji-ō-kär''pus), a. [Gr. angeion, a case or capsule, and karpos, fruit.] In bot. (a) having a fruit whose seed-vessels are inclosed within a covering that does not form a part of themselves, as the filbert covered by its husk, or the acorn seated in its cupule. (b) Having the seeds or spores covered, as certain lichens.

Angiography (an-ji-og'ra-fi), n. [Gr. angeion, a vessel, and graphē, description.] In med. a description of the vessels of the human body.

Angiology (an-ji-ol'o-ji), n. [Gr. angeion, a vessel, and logos, discourse.] In med. a treatise or discourse on the vessels of the human body, as the arteries, veins, lymphatics, &c.

Angiomonospermous (an'ji-ō-mon'ō-spėrm''us), a. [Gr. angeion, a vessel, monos, alone, and sperma, seed.] In bot. producing one seed only in a pod.

Angiopteris (an-ji-op'tėr-is), n. [Gr. angeion, a vessel, and pteris, a fern.] A genus of ferns, nat. order Marattiaceæ, found in India, Ceylon, and the islands of the Eastern Archipelago, some of whose species are cultivated in our hothouses. A. evecta, the original species, is used by the Sandwich Islanders to perfume their cocoa-nut oil.

Angioscope (an'ji-ō-skōp), n. [Gr. angeion, a vessel, and skopeō, to view.] An instrument for examining the capillary vessels of a body.

Angiosperm (an'ji-ō-spėrm), n. [Gr. angeion, a vessel, and sperma, seed.] In bot. a plant which has its seeds inclosed in a seed-vessel. In modern classification exogens are divided into those whose seeds are inclosed in a seed-vessel, and those with seeds produced and ripened without the production of a seed-vessel. The former are angiosperms, and constitute the principal part of the species; the latter are gymnosperms, and chiefly consist of the Coniferæ and Cycadaceæ.

Angiospermia (an'ji-ō-spėrm''i-a), n. pl. [See ANGIOSPERM.] The second order of the Linnæan class Didynamia, having numerous seeds inclosed in an obvious seed-vessel, as in Digitalis.

Angiospermous (an'ji-ō-spėrm''us), a. Having seeds inclosed in a seed-vessel, such as the pea, apple, and the great mass of flowering plants: opposed to gymnospermous, or naked-seeded.

Angiosporous (an-ji-os'pō-rus), a. [Gr. angeion, a vessel, and spora, a seed.] In bot. a term applied to such fungi as have their spores inclosed in a bag, as Lycoperdon.

Angiotomy (an-ji-ot'o-mi), n. [Gr. angeion, a vessel, and tomē, a cutting.] In anat. dissection of the vessels of a body, especially of the human body.

Angle (ang'gl), n. [L. angulus, a corner.] The point where two lines meet, or the meeting of two lines in a point; a corner. In geom. a plain rectilineal angle is the mutual inclination of two straight lines which meet one another, but are not in the same straight line; or a rectilineal angle is the degree of opening or divergence of two straight lines which meet one another. The point where the lines meet is called the vertex of the angle or the angular point, and the lines which contain the angle are called its sides or legs. A clear idea of the nature of an angle is obtained by gradually opening a carpenter's rule or a pair of compasses, as the angle made by the parts of the rule or the legs of the compasses will become greater as the opening widens. It is evident that the magnitude of the angle does not depend upon the length of the lines which form it, but merely on their relative positions. An angle is best named by a single letter placed at its vertex, unless there be more angles than one at the same point. In this case the angle is generally expressed by three letters, the middle one of which is placed at the vertex or angular point, and the other two at some other point of the lines containing it. Thus, in fig. 1, the angle contained by A B and B C may be called the angle B, or the angle at B; but in fig. 2, where there are more angles than one at the point D, the angle contained by E D and D B is called the angle E D B. Angles are measured by an arc of a circle, described from the vertex with any radius: thus the arc D E (fig. 1), described from B as a centre, is a measure of the angle A B C, and the angle A B C is said to be an angle of as many degrees, and parts of a degree, as there are in the arc D E, a circle being always supposed to be divided into 360 degrees. (See ARC and CIRCLE.) Angles receive different names, according to their magnitude, their construction, their position, and the different branches of science in which they are employed. A right angle is an angle formed by a straight or right line falling on another perpendicularly, or an angle which is measured by an arc of 90 degrees. When a straight line, as A B (fig. 3), standing on another straight line C D, makes the two angles A B C and A B D equal to one another, each of these angles is called a right angle. An acute angle is that which is less than a right angle, as E B C. An obtuse angle is that which is greater than a right angle, as E B D. Acute and obtuse angles are both called oblique, in opposition to right angles. A rectilineal angle is that which is formed by two straight lines. A curvilineal angle is formed by two curved lines. A mixed angle is formed by a straight line with a curved line. Adjacent or contiguous angles are such as have one leg common to both angles, both together being equal to two right angles. Thus, in fig. 3, A B C and A B D, or E B C and E B D, are adjacent angles. Exterior or external angles, the angles of any rectilineal figure without it, made by producing the sides; thus, if the sides A B, B C, CA of the triangle ABC (fig. 4) be produced to the points FDE, the angles CBF, ACD, BAE are called exterior angles, in opposition to the angles ABC, BCA, CAB, which are called interior angles. For exterior, interior, and alternate angles, in reference to parallel lines, see EXTERIOR, INTERIOR, and ALTERNATE. — Vertical angles. See VERTICAL. — Angles of elevation and inclination. See ELEVATION and INCLINATION. — Angles of depression. See DEPRESSION. — Angles of incidence, reflection, and refraction. See INCIDENCE, REFLECTION, and REFRACTION. — Angle of position, in astron. See POSITION. — Angle of contact, the angle which a circle or other curve makes with a tangent at the point of contact. This term has been discarded from mathematics, and when a curve is supposed to be composed of infinitely small rectilinear elements, the infinitely small acute angle formed by one element with the production of the next answers to the old angle of contact, and is equal to what is called the angle of curvature. — Curvilinear angle, the angle at the meeting of the tangents of two curves. — Angle of direction, in mech. an angle contained by the lines of direction of two conspiring forces. — Angle of friction, in mech. the angle whose tangent is equal to the coefficient of friction. The coefficient of friction F of a body resting on an inclined plane is found by observing the angle of friction ϕ (the angle at which the body begins to slide), when F is equal to ϕ. — Angle of repose, that angle at which one body will just rest upon another without slipping. It varies, of course, with the natures of the bodies in contact, but is constant for the same bodies. It is called by Professor Moseley the limiting angle of resistance. — Angle of sight, in ordnance, the angle between a line drawn through the axis of a bore and a line drawn from the rear of the base-ring to the swell of the muzzle or to the top of the sight. — Facial angle. See FACIAL. — Solid angle, that which is made by more than two plane angles meeting in one point, and not lying in the same plane, as the angle of a cube. — Spherical angle, an angle on the surface of a sphere, contained between the arcs of two great circles which intersect each other. Thus, if AB and BC (fig. 5) be arcs of great circles intersecting one another at the point B, the angle ABC is the spherical angle which they make with one another, and it is equal to the angle of inclination formed by the planes of the great circles AB and BC. — Horary, or hour angle, the angle made by the arc through the poles and star with the meridian. — Angle capital, (a) in anc. Ionic arch. a capital on the flank column of a portico, having volutes on three sides, the exterior volute being placed at an angle of 135° (or 45°) with the plane of the frieze on front and flank. (b) In modern Ionic arch. the capital of a similarly situated column, having four volutes, each of which is at an angle of 135° (or 45°) with the plane of the frieze. — Angle of divergence, in bot. the angle made by two leaves on the stem, generally expressed as a fraction of the circumference of the stem, which is supposed to be a circle.

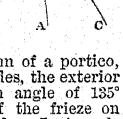

Fig. 5.

Angle† (ang'gl), n. [A. Sax. angel, angl, a fish-hook; G. angel, Icel. öngull, a hook; from a root meaning crooked, seen in anchor (which see).] A hook; an apparatus for taking fish, consisting of a rod, a line, and a hook, or of a line and hook.

> Give me mine angle—we'll to the river. Shak.
> I am, sir, a brother of the angle. Iz. Walton.

2. One who may be easily enticed; a gull: a reading supported by Knight and others in Shakspere's Taming of the Shrew, iv. 2, 61.

Angle (ang'gl), v.i. pret. and pp. angled; ppr. angling. To fish with an angle, or with line and hook. — To angle for, to fish for; to try to gain by some bait or insinuation, as men angle for fish. 'The hearts of all that he did angle for.' Shak.

Angle (ang'gl), v.t. To fish for or catch, as with an angle; to lure or entice, as by a bait. 'He angled the people's hearts.' Sir P. Sidney.

> You have angled me on with much pleasure to the thatch'd house. Iz. Walton.

Angle (ang'gl), n. One of the people called Angles. See ANGLES.

Angle-bar (ang'gl-bär), n. 1. In carp. a vertical bar at the angles or meetings of the faces of a polygonal or bow window. — 2. A rolled bar of iron for forming the edges of iron safes, bridges, and ships; or to be riveted to the corners of iron-boilers, tanks, &c., to connect the side plates.

Angle-bead (ang'gl-bēd), n. In building, a piece of wood fixed vertically upon the exterior or salient angles of apartments to preserve them, and also to serve as a guide by which to float the plaster. Called also Staff-bead.

Angle-brace (ang'gl-brās), n. In carp. (a) a piece of timber fixed at each extremity to one of the two pieces forming the adjacent sides of a system of framing, and subtending the angle formed by their junction. When it is fixed between the opposite angles of a quadrangular frame it is called a diagonal brace. They are also called respectively Angle-tie or Diagonal Tie. (b) An instrument consisting of a rectangular crank-frame like the carpenter's brace (see BRACE), but usually much stronger, and carrying a parallel tool-spindle terminating in a pad a, or bit-socket of the ordinary form. On this spindle is a small bevel-wheel, which gears into a second wheel on the axis of a winch-handle, by which motion is communicated to the tool. This instrument is chiefly used for boring holes in angular positions, where the ordinary revolving brace cannot be conveniently applied. For heavy work it is usually mounted in the ordinary drill-frame. Called also Corner-drill.

a, Angle-brace. b, Diagonal brace.

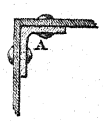
Boring Angle-brace.

Angled (ang'gld), a. Having angles: used chiefly in compounds.

Angle-float (ang'gl-flōt), n. In plastering, a float made to any internal angle to the planes of both sides of a room.

Angle-iron (ang'gl-ī-ėrn), n. A piece of iron rolled into the shape of the letter L, used for forming the joints of iron plates in girders, boilers, &c., to which it is riveted.



A, Angle-iron.

Anglemeter (ang'gl-mē-tėr), n. [Angle, and Gr. metron, measure.] Any instrument for measuring angles; but more particularly, an instrument used by geologists for measuring the dip of strata.

Angle-plane (ang'gl-plān), n. In carp. a plane whose bit reaches into a re-entering angle.

Angler (ang'glėr), n. 1. One that fishes with an angle. — 2. An acanthopterygious fish, family Lophiidæ (the Lophius piscatorius), otherwise called the Sea-devil, Fishing-frog, Toad-fish, and Frog-fish, 3 to 5 feet long, very ugly and voracious. See LOPHIUS.

Angle-rafter (ang'gl-raft-ėr), n. A rafter placed in the line of meeting of the inclined planes forming a hipped roof. Called also Hip and Piend Rafter. See HIP.

Angles (ang'glz), n. pl. [A. Sax. Engle, Angle.] A Low German tribe who in the earliest historical period had their seats in the district about Angeln, in the south-east of the duchy of Sleswig, and who in the fifth century and subsequently crossed over to Britain along with bands of Saxons, Jutes, and Frisians, and colonized a great part of what from them has received the name of England, as well as a portion of the Lowlands of Scotland. The Angles formed the largest body among the Germanic settlers in Britain, and founded the three kingdoms of East Anglia, Mercia, and Northumbria. See ANGLO-SAXON.

Anglesite (ang'gl-sīt), n. [From Anglesea, a British locality of the mineral.] A sulphate of lead occurring in prismatic crystals.

Angle-tie (ang'gl-tī), n. Same as Angle-brace (a).

Anglian (ang'gli-an), a. Of or pertaining to the tribe of the Angles.

Anglian (ang'gli-an), n. A member of the tribe of the Angles.

Anglic (ang'glik), a. Same as Anglican. [Rare.]

Anglican (ang'glik-an), a. [L.L. anglicus, from A. Sax. Engle, Angle. See ANGLES.] English; pertaining to England or the English nation; as, the Anglican Church. — Anglican Church, a term which strictly embraces only the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal churches in Ireland, Scotland, and the colonies, but is sometimes made to include also the Episcopal churches of the United States.

> Of all the prelates of the Anglican Church, Laud had departed farthest from the principles of the Reformation, and had drawn nearest to Rome. Macaulay.

Anglican (ang'glik-an), n. A member of the Church of England. 'Catholics, Anglicans, or Calvinists.' Burke.

Anglicanism (ang'glik-an-izm), n. 1. The principles of or adherence to the Established Church of England. — 2. Partiality to England and English institutions.

Anglice (ang'gli-sē). [L.] In English; in the English manner.

Anglicify (ang-glis'i-fī), v.t. To make English; to anglicize. [Rare and obsolete.]

Anglicism (ang'gli-sizm), n. 1. The quality of being English.

> If Addison's language had been less idiomatical it would have lost something of its genuine Anglicism. Johnson.

2. An English idiom.

Anglicize (ang'gli-sīz), v.t. pret. & pp. anglicized; ppr. anglicizing. To make English; to render conformable to the English idiom or to English analogies. 'The glaring affectation of anglicizing English words.' T. Warton.

Anglification (ang'gli-fi-kā"shon), n. The act of converting into English.

Anglify (ang'gli-fī), v.t. To convert into English; to anglicize; as, to anglify French words, that is, to give them an English form in orthography, inflection, or pronunciation; to adopt into the English language and make a part of it.

Angling (ang'gling), n. The act or art of fishing with a rod and line; rod-fishing.

> We may say of angling as Dr. Boteler said of strawberries: 'Doubtless God could have made a better berry, but doubtless God never did;' and so, if I might be judge, God never did make a more calm, quiet, innocent recreation than angling. Iz. Walton.

Anglish (ang'glish), a. and n. Anglo-Saxon; the Anglo-Saxon or Early English language. Prof. Haldeman.

Anglo- (ang'glō), prefix. [L.L. Anglus, from Angli. See ANGLES.] A prefix signifying English, or connected with England, frequently used in composition; as, in Anglo-American, Anglo-Indian.

Anglo-American (ang'glō-a-mer'i-kan), a. Pertaining to the descendants of Englishmen in America.

Anglo-American (ang'glō-a-mer'i-kan), n. A descendant from English ancestors born in America or the United States.

Anglo-Catholic (ang'glō-kath'o-lik), n. A member of the English Protestant Church; more specifically, a ritualist; a Puseyite; a High Churchman.

Anglo-Catholic (ang'glō-kath'o-lik), a. 1. A term employed to designate those churches which adopt the principles of the English Reformation; sometimes restricted to the Anglican or Established Church of England and the allied churches. — 2. A term sometimes applied to that party in the English Church which favours doctrines and the adoption of religious forms closely approaching those of the Roman Catholic Church, and otherwise known as the Ritualistic, High, or Puseyite section of the Church.

Anglo-Catholicism (ang'glō-ka-thol"i-sizm), n. 1. The principles or doctrines of the Anglican Church as embodied in the Book of Common Prayer and the Thirty-nine Articles. 2. The principles or doctrines of the Ritualistic or High-Church section of the Anglican Church.

Anglo-Danish (ang'glō-dān'ish), a. Pertaining to the English Danes, or the Danes who settled in England.

Anglo-Indian (ang'glō-in'di-an), n. One of the English race born or resident in the East Indies.

Anglo-Indian (ang'glō-in'di-an), a. Relating to the Anglo-Indians.

Anglo-Irish (ang'glō-ī'rish), n. pl. 1. English people born or resident in Ireland.—2. Descendants of parents English on the one side and Irish on the other.

Anglo-Irish (ang'glō-ī'rish), a. Pertaining to the Anglo-Irish.

Anglomania (ang-glō-mā'ni-a), n. [Anglo, and Gr. mania, madness.] An excessive or undue attachment to, respect for, or imitation of Englishmen or English institutions and customs by a foreigner.

Anglo-Norman (ang'glō-nor'man), a. Pertaining to the English Normans.

Anglo-Norman (ang'glō-nor'man), n. An English Norman; one partly Norman partly English. 'Charters forged by Anglo-Normans.' Wotton.

Anglophobia (ang-glō-fō'bi-a), n. [Anglo, and Gr. phobos, fear.] An excessive hatred to or dread of English people, customs, or institutions.

Anglo-Saxon (ang'glō-sak'son), n. [See ANGLES and SAXON.] 1. One of the nation formed by the union of the Angles, Saxons, and other early Teutonic settlers in Britain, or one of their descendants; a native of England or Lowland Scotland, or one descended from natives of these countries, as an inhabitant of the United States, Canada, Australia, &c.; one belonging to the English race. See extract.

As the Teutons in Britain began to grow together into one people they were sometimes called the Anglo-Saxons—that is the people made up of the Angles and Saxons,—but more commonly they were called Angles or English alone. And when so much of Britain as the Teutons lived in came to have a common name that name was Englaland or England, that is the land of the Angles or English. Saxon by itself always meant the people of those parts only where the Saxons settled, and the whole people was never so called except by the Celts.
E. A. Freeman.

[Some writers maintain that the proper meaning of Anglo-Saxon is English Saxon, a Saxon of England.]—2. The earliest form of the English language; the tongue brought to England by the Teutonic invaders, who began to make settlements there about 450 A.D. Anglo-Saxon had two chief dialects, Northern and Southern. After Wessex obtained the supremacy the Southern became the literary language, and had an extensive literature. After the Norman conquest the dialects became more various, and we distinguish three chief varieties—Northern, Midland, and Southern, of which the Midland was the most widely spread, and, gradually taking the lead, became modern English. See ENGLISH.

What is called Anglo-Saxon is really the oldest form of English. The Anglo-Saxon of the first period extends from A.D. 450 to A.D. 1100; that of the later period from A.D. 1100 to about A.D. 1250; after which date we arrive at early Middle English. Skeat.

Anglo-Saxon (ang'glō-sak'son), a. Pertaining to the Anglo-Saxons or early Teutonic settlers in Britain and their descendants; pertaining to the English race.

Anglo-Saxonism (ang'glō-sak'son-izm), n. A characteristic of the Anglo-Saxons; specifically, a word or idiom of the Anglo-Saxon language. Latham.

Angnail (ang'nāl), n. Same as Hangnail.

Angola (an-gō'la), n. [Corrupted from Angora.] A light and fashionable cloth, well adapted, from its repelling heat, for cloaks and overcoats, made from the wool of the Angora-goat. Simmonds. See ANGORA-WOOL.

Angola-pea (an-gō'la-pē), n. The Cajanus indicus, so called from Angola, in Western Africa, where it is grown, though not a native of that region. Called also Congo-pea and Pigeon-pea. See CAJANUS.

Angola-weed (an-gō'la-wēd), n. A kind of archil obtained from Angola, in Western Africa, from Roccella tinctoria.

Angor (ang'gor), n. [L.] 1. Pain; intense bodily pain.—2. In med. extreme anxiety, accompanied with painful constriction at the epigastrium, and often with palpitation and oppression. Dunglison.

Angora-cat (an-gō'ra-kat), n. One of the finest varieties of the domestic cat, distinguished for its size and beautiful long silky hair. It is originally from Angora, in Asia Minor.

Angora-goat (an-gō'ra-gōt), n. A variety of goat (Capra angorensis), native to the district surrounding Angora or Engour, in Asia Minor, distinguished for its beautiful silky hair, about 8 inches long. It is called by the Arabs chamal goat, chamal signifying silky or fine, whence the name camlet, applied to a fabric manufactured in Angora itself from the yarn made from its wool, and known as Turkey Yarn or Camel Yarn. See ANGORA-WOOL.

Angora-wool (an-gō'ra-wụl), n. The long white hair of the Angora-goat, highly prized in manufactures for its silky appearance, which fits it for shawls, laces, braids, and other ornamental fabrics. It is also largely used in the manufacture of Angola cloth, lace, plush, and camlets. Simmonds.

Angostura-bark (ang-gos-tū'ra-bärk), n. [From the town of Angostura, in Venezuela, on the river Orinoco.] An excellent bark, possessing aromatic, stimulant, and febrifugal properties, produced by a rutaceous plant, Galipea Cusparia. It was formerly prized as a febrifuge, and is now much used for a kind of bitters. Its use in medicine was discontinued because of the introduction into the markets of a false angostura-bark, obtained from the nux-vomica tree, which produced fatal effects. The Indians stupefy fishes with the powdered bark of the Galipea.

Angræcum (an-grē'kum), n. [Altered from angurek, the Malayan name of such plants.] A remarkable genus of tropical orchids, some of which are leafless, and all generally small-flowered. One species, A. sesquipedale, from Madagascar, has, however, the largest orchideous flower known. The leaves of A. fragrans are used in Bourbon, and to some extent in France, as tea, under the name of faham.

Angrily (ang'gri-li), adv. In an angry manner; peevishly; with indications of resentment.

Rashly and angrily I promised; but cunningly and patiently will I perform. Kingsley.

Angriness (ang'gri-nes), n. 1. The state of being angry.

Such an angriness of humour that we take fire at everything. Dr. H. More.

2. Inflammation and pain of a sore or swelling. [Obsolescent.]

Angry (ang'gri), a. [See ANGER.] 1. Feeling resentment; provoked: followed generally by with before a person, and at before a thing.

God is angry with the wicked every day. Ps. vii. 11.

Wherefore should God be angry at thy voice? Eccl. v. 6.

2. Showing anger; wearing the marks of anger; caused by anger; as, an angry countenance; angry words. Hence—3. Red. 'Sweet rose, whose hue angry and brave.' G. Herbert.—4. Raging; furious; tumultuous.

Or chain the angry vengeance of the waves. Judge Trumbull.

5. Sharp in a moral sense; stern; rigorous. [Rare.]

God had provided a severe and angry education to chastise the forwardness of a young spirit. Jer. Taylor.

6. Stimulated; keen; vigorous. [Rare.]

I never ate with angrier appetite. Tennyson.

7. In med. inflamed, as a sore; manifesting inflammation.

This serum, being accompanied by the thinner parts of the blood, grows red and angry. Wiseman.

SYN. Passionate, resentful, irritated, indignant, provoked, hot, raging, furious, tumultuous, wrathful, choleric, inflamed.

Anguifer (an'gwi-fėr), n. [L. anguis, a serpent, and fero, to bear.] In astron. a cluster of stars in the form of a man holding a serpent; Serpentarius, one of the twelve signs of the zodiac.

Anguilla (an-gwil'la), n. [L., an eel, dim. of anguis, a serpent.] A genus of apodal malacopterygious fishes, family Murænoidei, the true eels. See EEL.

Anguilliform (an-gwil'li-form), a. [L. anguilla, an eel, and forma, shape.] Having the form of an eel or of a serpent; resembling an eel or serpent.

Anguine (an'gwin), a. [L. anguineus, from anguis, a snake.] Pertaining to or resembling a snake; snakelike. 'The anguine or snakelike reptiles.' Owen.—Anguine lizard, a snake-lizard of South Africa (Chamæsaura anguina). See CHAMÆSAURA.

Anguineal (an-gwin'e-al), a. [See ANGUINE.] Resembling or pertaining to a snake or snakes.

Anguis (an'gwis), n. [L.] A genus of reptiles belonging to the family Scincidæ. The species are innocent and harmless, but are held in great horror by the vulgar. Their eyes are very small, and in consequence they have been often supposed to be blind. The body is very brittle; the tail is easily broken off, but readily sprouts out afresh, and at the end of a year is quite renewed. A. fragilis (the common blind-worm or slow-worm) is the best known species. See BLIND-WORM.

Anguish (ang'gwish), n. [O.E. anguis, angoise, anguysshe, &c., Fr. angoisse, It. angoscia, sorrow, anguish; L. angustia, a strait, perplexity, from angustus, narrow; root ang as in E. anger (which see).] 1. Extreme pain, either of body or mind.

And they hearkened not unto Moses, for anguish of spirit, and for cruel bondage. Ex. vi. 9.

When pain and anguish wring the brow,
A ministering angel thou. Sir W. Scott.

2. Any keen affection of the emotions or feelings.

He cried in an anguish of delight and gratitude. Thackeray.

—Agony, Anguish. See under AGONY.—SYN. Distress, pang, throe, agony, torture, torment.

Anguish (ang'gwish), v.t. To distress with extreme pain or grief. 'Thine anguished soul.' Bp. Hall. 'But we be not anguished.' Wickliffe.

Anguished (ang'gwisht), pp. and a. Affected by anguish; expressing or caused by anguish.

On thy cold forehead starts the anguished dew. Coleridge.

Angular (ang'gū-lėr), a. [L. angularis, from angulus, an angle.] 1. Having an angle or angles; having corners; pointed; as, an angular figure; an angular piece of rock.—2. Consisting of an angle; forming an angle; as, an angular point.—Angular artery and vein, in anat. (a) the termination of the facial artery and vein, because they pass by the greater angle of the eye; (b) the facial artery and vein themselves, because they pass under the angle of the jaw. Dunglison.—Angular capital. Same as Angle Capital (which see under ANGLE).—Angular intervals, in astron. those arcs of the equator which are intercepted between circles of declination passing through the objects observed. They are measured by means of the transit instrument and clock.—Angular motion, in physics, the motion of any body which moves circularly about a fixed or relatively fixed point; as, the angular motion of a pendulum or a planet: so called because such motion is measured by the angle contained between the lines drawn from the fixed point to the successive positions of the moving body.—Angular perspective, in painting, that kind of perspective in which neither of the sides of the principal object is parallel to the plane of the picture; and, therefore, in the representation, the horizontal lines of both converge to vanishing points: called also Oblique Perspective.—Angular processes, in anat. the orbital processes of the frontal bone near the angles of the eye.—Angular sections, that part of mathematics which treats of the division of angles into equal parts.—Angular velocity, in physics, the rate at which a body revolves round a fixed axis; that is, the rate at which a line continually drawn from the one body to the other shifts its position in space.

Angularity (ang-gū-lar'i-ti), n. The quality of being angular.

Angularly (ang'gū-lèr-li), adv. In an angular manner; with angles or corners.

Angularness (ang'gū-lèr-nes), n. The quality of being angular.

Angulate, Angulated (ang'gū-lāt, ang'gū-lāt-ed), a. [L. angulatus.] Formed with angles or corners; of an angular form; angled; cornered; as, angulate stems, leaves, petioles, &c.

Angulation (ang-gū-lā'shon), n. The state of being angulated; that which is angulated.

Angulo-dentate (ang'gū-lō-den'tāt), a. In bot. angularly-toothed, as certain leaves.

Angulometer (ang-gū-lom'et-èr), n. [L. angulus, an angle, and Gr. metron, measure.] An instrument for measuring external angles.

Angulosity (ang-gū-los'i-ti), n. A state of being angulous or angular.

Angulous (ang'gū-lus), a. Angular; having corners; hooked. 'Held together by hooks and angulous involutions.' Glanville.

Angust (ang-gust'), a. [L. angustus, narrow. See ANGER.] Narrow; strait. Burton.

Angustate (ang-gus'tāt), a. [L. angustatus, pp. of angusto, to make narrow.] Diminishing rapidly in breadth; attenuated; narrow.

Angustation (ang-gus-tā'shon), n. The act of making angustate or narrow; a straitening, or being made narrow.

Angusticlave (ang-gus'ti-klāv), n. [L. angustus, narrow, and clavus, a knob, nail, a purple stripe.] A narrow purple stripe or band reaching from the shoulder to the bottom of the tunic worn by Roman knights. There was probably a band on each side.

Angustifolious, Angustifoliate (ang-gus'-ti-fō"li-us, ang-gus'ti-fō"li-āt), a. [L. angustus, narrow, and folium, a leaf.] In bot. having narrow leaves.

Anhang† (an-hang'), v.t. [A. Sax. onhengian.] To hang up.

He bad to take him, and anhang him fast. Chaucer.

Anharmonic (an-här-mon'ik), a. [Gr. prefix an, not, and E. harmonic.] In geom. a term applied by Chasles to a double ratio, compounded of AB to BC, and of CD to DA, or (AB : BC) (CD : DA) when A, B, C, D are four points taken in a straight line in any order, four lines through a point, or four planes through a line.

An-heirs, An-heires. An expression of Shakspere which has puzzled commentators, the most probable conjecture being that of Theobald that it is a corruption of mynheers. Others read it, On, hearts! On, heroes, &c. 'Will you go, an-heirs?—Have with you, mine host.' Merry Wives, ii. 1.

Anhelation (an-hē-lā'shon), n. [L. anhelatio, anhelationis, from anhelo, to pant, or breathe with difficulty, from halo, to breathe.] Shortness of breath; a panting; difficult respiration; also, eager desire or aspiration.

These anhelations of divine souls after the adorable object of their love. Glanville.

Anhele† (an-hēl'), v.i. [See ANHELATION.] To pant, especially with eager desire and anxiety. 'They anhele . . . for the finish of our convocation.' Latimer.

Anhelose (an-hēl'ōs), a. Out of breath; panting; breathing with difficulty. [Rare.]

Anhima (an'hē-ma), n. A Brazilian aquatic bird, the Palamedea cornuta, horned-screamer or kamichi. See PALAMEDEA.

Anhydride (an-hī'drid), n. [Gr. neg. prefix an, and hydōr, water.] One of a class of chemical compounds, which may be conceived as formed from one or more molecules of water, in which the whole of the hydrogen is replaced by one or more negative radicals (which may themselves contain hydrogen), while the corresponding acids represent one or more molecules of water in which the same radicals replace one half of the hydrogen. Thus, water being H_2O, hypochlorous anhydride is Cl_2O (or Cl Cl O), and hypochlorous acid is HClO. Again, sulphuric anhydride is SO_3 (or SO_2O), representing H_2O, while sulphuric acid is H_2SO_4 (or $H_2SO_2O_2$), representing $2\,H_2O$ (or $H_2H_2O_2$). They are sometimes, but improperly, called anhydrous acids.

Anhydrite (an-hī'drīt), n. [See ANHYDRIDE.] Anhydrous sulphate of calcium, found in the salt-mines of Austria and Salzburg, and in large masses in the Harz Mountains. It presents several varieties of structure and colour. The vulpinite of Italy is the only variety used in the arts. This mineral is of a granular structure, resembling a coarse-grained granite. Its colour is grayish white, intermingled with blue.

Anhydrous (an-hī'drus), a. [Gr. anydros, dry—neg. prefix an, and hydōr, water.] Destitute of water; specifically, in chem. destitute of the water of crystallization; as, anhydrous salts.

Anicut (an'i-kut), n. Same as Annicut (which see).

Anidiomatical (an-id'i-o-mat"ik-al), a. [Gr. neg. prefix an, and E. idiomatical.] Contrary to the idiom or analogies of a language; not idiomatical.

You would not say 'two times;' it is anidiomatical. Landor.

Anient (an'i-ent), v.t. [Fr. anéantir, to annihilate—a, to, and néant, nothingness. Néant from scholastic L. necentem, acc. of necens—L. nec, neg., and ens, entis, being.] 1.† To reduce to nothing or nothingness; to bring to naught; to frustrate. Piers Plowman.—2. In law, to abrogate; to make null. Bouvier.

Anientise,† v.t. To reduce to nothing; to annihilate.

Ire, coveitise, and hastifness, . . . which three things ye have not anientissed or destroyed. Chaucer.

Anight (a-nīt'), adv. [Prefix a, on, at, or of, and night.] In the night time.

I broke my sword upon a stone, and bade him take that, for coming anight to Jane Smile. Shak.

Anights (a-nīts'), adv. [An adverbial genitive of the preceding word.] By night; nightly: used of repeated or habitual acts.

The turnkey now his flock returning sees,
Duly let out anights to steal for fees. Swift.

Anigosanthus (a-nī'go-san"thus), n. [Gr. anoigō, to expand, and anthos, a flower: in allusion to the long conspicuous scapes upon which the flowers are raised.] A genus of plants, nat. order Hæmodoraceæ, natives of Australia, common in our greenhouses because of their curious woolly flowers.

Anil (an'il), n. [Sp. anil, Ar. neel, Skr. nīlam, indigo, nīli, the indigo-plant, from nīla, blue.] A shrub from whose leaves and stalks the West Indian indigo is made. It belongs to the genus Indigofera (I. Anil), and is a larger plant than I. tinctoria, the indigo-plant of Asia.

Anile (an'il), a. [L. anilis, old-womanish, from anus, an old woman.] Old-womanish; aged; imbecile. 'Puerile or anile ideas.' Walpole.

Aniline (an'i-lin), n. [From anil (which see).] (C_6H_7N.) A substance which furnishes a number of brilliant and durable dyes. It is found in small quantities in coal-tar, but the aniline of commerce is obtained from benzole, another product of coal-tar, consisting of hydrogen and carbon (C_6H_6). Benzole when acted on by nitric acid produces nitro-benzole; and this substance again when treated with nascent hydrogen, generally produced by the action of acetic acid upon iron filings or scraps, produces aniline. It is a colourless, oily liquid, somewhat heavier than water, with a peculiar vinous smell and a burning taste. When acted on by arsenious acid, bichromate of potassium, stannic chloride, &c., aniline produces a great variety of compounds of very beautiful colours, known by the names of aniline purple, aniline green, violine, magenta, &c.

Anility, Anileness (a-nil'i-ti, an'il-nes), n. The state of being anile; the old age of a woman; dotage. 'Marks of anility.' Sterne.

Anilla (an-il'la), n. A commercial term for West Indian indigo, derived from the name of the plant whence it is prepared. See ANIL.

Anima (an'i-ma), n. [L. See ANIMAL.] Soul; vital principle; the intelligent principle supposed to preside over vital actions. Anciently applied to the active principle of a drug as if it were its soul.—Anima mundi, the soul of the world; the ethereal essence or spirit once supposed to be diffused through the universe organizing and acting throughout the whole and in all its different parts.

The doctrine of the anima mundi, as held by the Stoics and Stratonicians, is closely allied to pantheism; while according to others, the soul of the universe is altogether intermediate between the Creator and his works. Fleming.

Animable† (an'im-a-bl), a. Susceptible of animation.

Animadversal (an'i-mad-vèr"sal), n. [See ANIMADVERSION.] That which has the power of perceiving. [Rare and obsolete.]

That lively inward animadversal: it is the soul itself; for I cannot conceive the body doth animadvert. Dr. H. More.

Animadversion (an'i-mad-vèr"shon), n. [L. animadversio, the perception of an object, censure—animus, the mind, ad, to, and verto, versum, to turn.] 1. The act or faculty of observing or noticing; observation; perception.

The soul is the sole percipient which hath animadversion and sense. Glanville.

2. Remarks by way of censure or criticism; reproof; blame.

He dismissed their commissioners with severe and sharp animadversions. Clarendon.

3.† A kind of ecclesiastical punishment. See extract.

An ecclesiastical censure and an ecclesiastical animadversion are different things; for a censure has a relation to a spiritual punishment, but an animadversion has only a respect to a temporal one, as, degradation, and the delivering the person over to the secular court. Ayliffe.

SYN. Stricture, criticism, censure, remark, reproof, blame, comment.

Animadversive (an'i-mad-vèr"siv), a. Having the power of perceiving; percipient. 'The animadversive faculty.' Coleridge.

Animadversiveness (an'i-mad-vèr"siv-nes), n. The power of animadverting. Bailey.

Animadvert (an'i-mad-vèrt"), v.i. [L. animadverto—animus, mind, and adverto, to turn to.] 1. To take cognizance; to perceive; to notice. See extract under ANIMADVERSAL.—2. To make remark by way of criticism or censure; to pass strictures or criticisms.

I wish, sir, you would do us the favour to animadvert frequently upon the false taste the town is in. Steele.

SYN. To remark, criticise, blame, censure, comment.

Animadverter (an'i-mad-vèrt"èr), n. One who animadverts or makes remarks by way of censure.

Animal (an'i-mal), n. [L. animal, a living being, from anima, air, breath, life, the soul, a feminine form corresponding to animus, the soul, the emotional part of one's being; Gr. anemos, air, wind, from a root an, to breathe or blow, seen also in Skr. ana, breath, spirit; and in Goth. usanan, to expire—us, out, and anan, to breathe; O.Sc. aynde, O.E. onde, breath.] 1. An organized sentient living being. Animals are essentially distinguished from plants by the property of sensation, the power of voluntary motion, the active and intelligent ability of nourishing themselves, by the predominance of nitrogen in their composition, and by their incapacity to originate protein or nitrogenous compounds, plants possessing this power. The contractile property of some plants, as the sensitive plant, has the appearance of being the effect of sensation, but it is only the effect of irritability. The history of animals is called zoology. See PLANT.—2. An inferior or irrational being, in contradistinction to man; a brute; a beast; as, men and animals.

Animal (an'i-mal), a. 1. Belonging or relating to animals; as, animal functions.—2. Pertaining to the merely sentient part of a living being, as distinguished from the intellectual, rational, or spiritual part; as, the animal passions or appetites.—3. Of or pertaining to, or consisting of, the flesh of animals; as, animal food.—Animal heat, a certain amount of heat or temperature possessed by animals, which is necessary for the performance of vital action. The only classes of animals in which a constantly elevated temperature is kept up are birds and mammalia. The bodily heat of the former varies from 100° F. to 112° F. and of the latter from 96° F. to 104° F. The mean or average heat of the human body is about 99° F., and it never falls much below this in health. The cause of the evolution of heat in the animal body is referred to the union (by a process resembling ordinary combustion) of the carbon and hydrogen of the system with the oxygen taken in from the air in the process of respiration. It has also been found that plants evolve a certain degree of heat by a process somewhat analogous.—Animal kingdom, one of the three principal divisions into which all natural bodies are divided, the others being the vegetable and mineral kingdoms. The study of the objects comprehended within this kingdom of nature is termed zoology. See ZOOLOGY.—Animal spirits, natural buoyancy of spirits; cheerfulness; animation; gaiety and good humour.

Animalcular, Animalculine (an-i-mal'kū-lèr, an-i-mal'kū-lin), a. Pertaining to or resembling an animalcule or animalcules.

Animalcule (an-i-mal'kūl), n. [L.L. animalculum, dim. of L. animal, an animal.]

A minute animal, especially one that is microscopic or invisible to the naked eye. Animalcules exist abundantly in rivers and ponds, and in all animal and vegetable infusions.

Animalculist (an-i-mal'kūl-ist), n. One versed in the knowledge of animalcules.

Animalculum (an-i-mal'kū-lum), n. pl. Animalcula (an-i-mal'kū-la). An animalcule.

Animal-flower (an'i-mal-flou'ėr), n. A name sometimes given to the sea-anemones or other animal productions having some resemblance to flowers.

Animalish (an'i-mal-ish), a. Of or pertaining to or like an animal, especially an irrational animal; brutish. [Rare.]

> The world hath no blood nor brains, nor any animalish or humane form. Cudworth.

Animalism (an'i-mal-izm), n. 1. The state of a mere animal; the state of being actuated by sensual appetites only, and not by intellectual or moral qualities; sensuality.—2. An animal; specifically, a human being possessing mere animal appetites and passions. [Rare.]

> Girls, Hetairai, curious in their art,
> Hired animalisms, vile as those that made
> The mulberry-faced dictator's orgies worse
> Than aught they fable of the quiet gods.
> Tennyson.

3. In physiol. a theory which holds that the embryo is entirely formed from the spermatic communication of the male.

Animality (an-i-mal'i-ti), n. The state of being an animal; animal existence or nature; specifically, in physiol. the aggregate of those vital phenomena which, superadded to vegetality, constitute animal existence. See VEGETALITY.

Animalization (an'i-mal-iz-ā"shon), n. The act of animalizing: as, (a) the act of giving animal life, or endowing with the properties of an animal. (b) Conversion into animal matter by the process of assimilation. 'The alimentary canal, in which the conversion and animalization of the food takes place.' Owen.

Animalize (an'i-mal-īz), v.t. pret. & pp. animalized; ppr. animalizing. 1. To give animal life to; to endow with the attributes of an animal. Warburton.—2. To convert into animal matter.—3. To cause to be actuated chiefly by the animal part of man's nature; to reduce to the level of an irrational animal; to bring under the sway of animal appetites. Coleridge.—To animalize vegetable fibre, to confer upon vegetable fibre the physical characteristics of animal fibre, as by treating cotton with a strong solution of caustic soda, when the fibre shrinks, becomes stronger, and has an increased capacity for receiving colouring matter.

Animalness (an'i-mal-nes), n. The state of being an animal; animality.

Animant (an'i-mant), a. Possessing or conferring the properties of life and soul; quickening. Cudworth. [Rare.]

Animastic† (an-i-mas'tik), n. The doctrine of the soul; psychology.

> The other schoolmen . . . carefully explained that these operations were not in their own nature proposed to the logician; for, as such, they belonged to animastic, as they called it, or psychology. Sir W. Hamilton.

Animate (an'i-māt), v.t. pret. & pp. animated; ppr. animating. [L. animatus, animated, pp. of animo, to fill with breath. See ANIMAL.] 1. To give natural life to; to quicken; to make alive; as, the soul animates the body.—2. To inspire or inform, as if with life; to give life or liveliness to; to heighten the powers or effect of.

> But none, ah, none can animate the lyre,
> And the mute strings with vocal souls inspire.
> Dryden.

3. To give spirit or vigour to; to infuse courage, joy, or other enlivening passion into; to stimulate or incite; as, to animate dispirited troops.

> The more to animate the people, he stood on high, from whence he might be best heard, and cried unto them with a loud voice. Knolles.

SYN. To enliven, inspirit, stimulate, exhilarate, inspire, instigate, rouse, urge, cheer, prompt, incite, quicken, gladden.

Animate (an'i-māt), a. Alive; possessing animal life. 'Creatures animate.' Milton.

> Every acre of soil was animate, so to speak, with duties and privileges, which had attached to it from time immemorial, and could not be lost. C. H. Pearson.

Animated (an'i-māt-ed), p. and a. 1. Being endowed with animal life; as, the various classes of animated beings.—2. Lively; vigorous; full of spirit; indicating animation; as, an animated discourse.

> On the report there was an animated debate. Macaulay.

3. In the fine arts, applied to a painting or statue which is executed with such vigour and truth that it appears full of life. Fairholt.

> Can storied urn or animated bust
> Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
> Gray.

Animateness† (an'i-māt-nes), n. The state of being animate or animated.

Animater (an'i-māt-ėr), n. One who animates or gives life.

Animating (an'i-māt-ing), p. and a. Giving life; infusing spirit; enlivening; rousing. 'Animating strains.' Worcester.

Animatingly (an'i-māt-ing-li), adv. So as to animate or excite feeling.

Animation (an-i-mā'shon), n. The act of animating or state of being animated: (a) the act of infusing animal life, or the state of being animated or having life infused. (b) Liveliness; briskness; the state of being full of spirit and vigour; as, he recited the story with great animation. (c) In the fine arts, the character of a figure or group designed with such energy and vigour as to suggest the idea of life and motion.—SYN. Life, vivacity, spirit, buoyancy, sprightliness, liveliness.

Animative (an'i-māt-iv), a. Having the power of giving life or spirit.

Animator (an'i-māt-ėr), n. One who or that which animates or gives life or anything analogous to life. Sir T. Browne.

Animé (an'i-me), n. [Fr.] In her. of a different tincture from the animal itself: said of the eyes of a rapacious animal.

Anime (an'i-me), n. [Sp.] 1. A resin exuding from the stem of a large American tree of the genus Hymenæa (H. Courbaril), called in the West Indies locust-tree. It is of a transparent amber colour, with a light agreeable smell, and has little or no taste. It dissolves entirely, but not readily, in rectified spirit of wine, and burns with a very fragrant smell, and is therefore used in scenting pastilles. It produces one of the finest varnishes.—2. Indian copal produced by Vateria indica. See VATERIA.

Animetta (an-i-met'ta), n. [Dim. of L. anima.] Eccles. the cloth which covers the cup of the eucharist.

Animism (an'i-mizm), n. [L. anima, the soul.] 1. The hypothesis of Pythagoras and Plato of a force (Anima mundi, or soul of the world) immaterial but inseparable from matter, and giving to matter its form and movements.—2. The system of medicine, propounded by Stahl, in which the rational soul is regarded as the principle of life, the body being a matter incapable of self-movement, and not only originally formed by the soul, but also set in motion by the working of its elastic power. Hence it was inferred that the source of disease must be looked for in the soul, and medical treatment should be confined to an attempt to remove the obstacles which have arisen to the free and full working of the soul.—3. The general doctrine of souls and other spiritual beings; especially, the belief that soul or spirit resides in inanimate objects and phenomena, held by various races of people. The view that all phenomena in nature not due to obvious causes arise from spiritual agency seems to have prevailed generally among communities that have made little advance in civilization. A belief of this kind is that of a human apparitional soul, that is, of a vital and animating principle residing in the body but distinct from it, bearing its form and appearance, but wanting its material and solid substance.

Animist (an'i-mist), n. One who maintains animism in any of its various senses.

Animistic (an-i-mist'ik), a. Of or pertaintaining to, embracing or founded on, animism; as, animistic philosophy.

Animose (an'i-mōs), a. [L. animosus, full of courage, ardent, from animus, the mind, courage, pride.] Full of spirit; hot; vehement; resolute. Ash.

Animosity (an-i-mos'i-ti), n. [L. animositas, from animosus. See ANIMOSE.] 1.† Animation; courage; spiritedness.

> Cato, before he durst give the fatal stroke, spent part of the night in reading the Immortality of Plato, thereby confirming his wavering hand unto the animosity of that attempt. Sir T. Browne.

2. Violent hatred, accompanied with active opposition; active enmity.

> The animosity produced by difference of race was increased by difference of religion, . . . when Scotland had set the example of successful resistance, when England was distracted by internal quarrels the smothered rage of the Irish broke forth into acts of fearful violence. Macaulay.

—Animosity, Enmity, Malice. Animosity differs from enmity in that it is accompanied by passion, and is generally avowed and active; while enmity may be secret and inactive, though more deep-seated and inveterate. It is a less criminal passion than malice. One who harbours animosity seeks to gain a cause or destroy an enemy or rival, from hatred or private interest; a person actuated by malice seeks to do injury to another merely for the sake of giving pain.

Animus (an'i-mus), n. [L., the mind.] Intention; purpose; spirit; temper; especially, hostile spirit or angry temper; as, the animus with which a book is written.

Anion (an'i-on), n. [Gr. ana, upward, and iōn, going. Lit. that which goes up.] In elect. a term applied by Faraday to the element of an electrolyte, which in electrochemical decompositions appears at the positive pole or anode, and is usually termed the electro-negative ingredient of a compound, as oxygen, chlorine, and an acid. See ANODE, CATION.

Anise (an'is), n. [Fr. and Pr. anis, from L. anisum, Gr. anison.] An annual plant of the genus Pimpinella (P. anisum), nat. order Umbelliferæ. It grows naturally in Egypt, and is cultivated in Spain and Malta, whence the seed, or rather the fruit, is imported. The flowers are small and white; the fruit or 'seed' is ovate with ten narrow ribs, between which are oil-vessels. Anise seed has an aromatic smell and a pleasant warm taste; it is largely employed in the manufacture of liqueurs. When distilled with water it yields a volatile syrupy oil having an aromatic smell, which separates when cooled into two portions, a light oil and a solid camphor. Star or Chinese anise is Illicium anisatum. See ILLICIUM.

Aniseed (an'i-sēd), n. 1. The seed of the anise.—2. A cordial or liqueur prepared from it. See ANISE.

Anisette (an-i-set), n. [Fr.] A liqueur flavoured with anise; aniseed.

Anisic (a-nis'ik), a. Of or pertaining to anise.—Anisic acid ($C_8H_8O_3$), an acid obtained from aniseed by the action of oxidizing substances. It is crystallizable and volatile, and forms salts which crystallize readily.

Anisodactyla (an-ī'sō-dak"ti-la), n. pl. [Gr. an for a, not, isos, equal, and daktylos, a finger, toe.] One of the four sections into which the pachydermatous or thick-skinned animals have been subdivided with reference to the conformation of their feet or paddles. The Anisodactyla are characterized by having several hoofs, forming a single series round the bottom of the foot. This section comprehends the bulkiest terrestrial animals, as the mammoth, mastodon, elephant, rhinoceros, hippopotamus, tapir, &c.

Anisodactyle (an-ī'sō-dak"til), n. 1. One of an order of birds in the classification of Temminck, including those insessorial species the toes of which are of unequal length, as in the nut-hatch.—2. One of the Anisodactyla.

Anisodynamous (an-ī'so-din"am-us), a. [Gr. anisos, unequal, and dynamis, power.] In bot. a name given to monocotyledonous plants, because having only one cotyledon, they grow at first with more force on one side of their axis than on the other.

Anisomeric (an-ī'so-mer"ik), a. [Gr. anisos, unequal, and meros, a part.] Not consisting of symmetrical or corresponding parts; unsymmetrical. Dana.

Anisostemonous (an-ī'so-stem"on-us), a. [Gr. anisos, unequal, and stēmōn, the warp of a web.] In bot. a term applied to plants in which the number of the stamens does not correspond with the number of the petals or the sepals; as, for instance, when a flower having five sepals has three or seven stamens.

Anitrogenous (a-nī-troj'en-us), a. Not containing or supplying nitrogen; non-nitrogenous.

Anjeela (an-jē'la), n. A sort of floating-house, supported upon two large canoes, connected with planks, and used by the Singhalese both for a habitation and as a means of transporting pottery, wood, oil, &c.

Anker (ang'kėr), n. [D.] A Dutch liquid measure, formerly used in England, containing 10 wine gallons.

Anker,† n. An anchorite or hermit. Chaucer.

Ankerite (ang'kėr-īt), n. [After Prof. Anker of Grätz.] A crystallized variety of dolomite containing much iron. It consists of carbonates of lime, iron, magnesia, and manganese, and is much prized as an ore of iron for smelting and a flux. It occurs near Torness in the Orkneys, in amygdaloid.

Ankle (ang'kl), n. [A. Sax. ancleow, oncleow, O. Fris. onklef, ankel, D. enklaauw, enkel, Dan. and Sw. ankel, Icel. ökkla, G. enkel, O.H.G. anchal. Probably from a root ang, meaning crooked. See ANCHOR.] The joint which connects the foot with the leg.

Ankle-bone (ang'kl-bōn), n. The bone of the ankle.

Ankled (ang'kld), a. Having ankles: used in composition; as, well-ankled.

Anklet (ang'klet), n. 1. A little ankle.—2. An ornament, as a ring of metal, for the ankle.—3. A framework for the leg, intended to stiffen the ankle-joint and prevent the ankle turning sideways in skating.—4. An article of dress, which forms an extension above the top of the boot or the shoe, and is in some cases a protection for a weak ankle, in others merely an ornamental extension.

Ankylose (ang'ki-lōs), v.t. [See ANKYLOSIS.] To fix immovably, as a joint; to stiffen. Owen.

Ankylosed (ang'ki-lōst), p. and a. Immovably fixed or stiffened, as the movable bones of joints, by disease; affected with or consolidated by ankylosis.

Ankylosis (ang-ki-lō'sis), n. [Gr., a stiffening of the joints, from angkylos, crooked, angkylē, a bend, a joint, the elbow.] Stiffness and immovability of a joint; morbid adhesion of the articular ends of contiguous bones. This is sometimes caused by a want of the oily fluid, termed synovial fluid, secreted at the joints. Improperly written Anchylosis.

Ankylotic (ang-ki-lot'ik), a. Pertaining to ankylosis.

Anlace. See ANELACE.

Anlaut (an'lout), n. [G. prefix an, marking an approach or beginning, and laut, sound.] In philol. the initial sound of a word.

Ann, Annat (an, an'nat), n. [See ANNATS.] In Scots law, the portion of stipend payable for the half-year after the death of a clergyman of the Church of Scotland, to which his family or nearest of kin have right.

Anna (an'na), n. In the East Indies, the sixteenth part of a rupee, or about 1½*d.* sterling.

Annal (an'nal), n. [L. annalis, pertaining to a year, from annus, a year.] 1. A register or record of the events of a year: chiefly used in the plural. 'A last year's annal.' Warburton. See ANNALS.—2. In the R. Cath. Ch. a mass said for any person every day in the year; or a mass said on a particular day every year.

Annalist (an'nal-ist), n. A writer of annals.

> The monks . . . were the only annalists in those ages. Hume.

Annalistic (an-nal-ist'ik), a. Pertaining or peculiar to an annalist. 'Written in a stiff annalistic method.' Sir G. C. Lewis.

Annalize (an'nal-īz), v.t. To record in annals, or as in annals. 'Miracle, deserving a Baronius to annalize it.' Sheldon. [Rare.]

Annals (an'nalz), n. pl. [L. annales (libri, books, understood), annalis, pertaining to a year, from annus, a year.] 1. A history or relation of events in chronological order, each event being recorded under the year in which it happened; as, the Annals of Tacitus.—2. A periodical publication containing records of discoveries, transactions of societies, &c.; as, the annals of science. —History, Chronicle, Annals. See HISTORY.

Annamese (an'am-ēz), n. and a. Same as Anamese.

Annats, Annates (an'nats, an'nāts), n. pl. [L.L. annata, from L. annus, a year.] A year's income of a spiritual living; the first-fruits originally given to the pope, upon the decease of a bishop, abbot, or parish clerk, and paid by his successor. In England they were, at the Reformation, vested in the king, and in the reign of Queen Anne restored to the church, and appropriated to the augmentation of poor livings.

> Next year the annates or first-fruits of benefices, a constant source of discord between the nations of Europe and their spiritual chief, were taken away by act of parliament. Hallam.

Annatto (an-nat'tō), n. See ARNOTTO.

Anneal (an-nēl'), v.t. [A. Sax. anælan, onælan, to set on fire, to burn, to anneal—an or on, on, and ælan, to kindle, to burn up.] 1. To heat, as glass or iron vessels, in an oven or furnace, and then cool slowly, for the purpose of rendering less brittle; to temper by a gradually diminishing heat. Metals made hard and brittle by hammering, by this process recover their malleability.—2. To heat, as glass or tiles, in order to fix colours; to bake.

> And like a picture shone in glass annealed. Dryden.

Annect (an-nekt'), v.t. [L. annecto. See ANNEX.] To connect or join. Sir T. Elyot.

> It is united to it by golden rings at every corner, the like rings being annected to the ephod. Whiston.

Annectant (an-nekt'ant), a. [L. annectere. See ANNECT.] Connecting; annexing.

Annelata, Annellata (an-ne-lā'ta, an-nel-lā'ta), n. pl. Same as Annelida.

Annelid, Annelidan (an'ne-lid, an-nel'i-dan), n. One of the Annelida (which see).

Annelida (an-nel'i-da), n. pl. [L. annellus, a little ring, dim. of anus, a ring.] An extensive division or class of Annulosa or articulate animals, so called because their bodies are formed of a great number of small rings, as in the earthworm. The earthworm, the lobworm, the nereis, and the leech belong to this division. They have red, rarely yellow or green, blood circulating in a double system of contractile vessels, a double ganglionated nervous cord, and respire by external branchiæ, internal vesicles, or by the skin. Called also Annulata.

Annelide (an'nel-id), n. One of the Annelida.

Annex (an-neks'), v.t. [L. annecto, annexum, to bind to—ad, to, and necto, nexum, to bind.] 1. To unite at the end; to subjoin; to affix; as, to annex a codicil to a will.—2. To unite, as a smaller thing to a greater; as, to annex a province to a kingdom.—3. To connect, especially as a consequence; as, to annex a penalty to a prohibition, or punishment to guilt.

> Industry hath annexed thereto the fairest fruits and the richest rewards. Barrow.

—Add, Annex, Unite. See under ADD.

Annex (an-neks'), v.i. To join; to be united; to be connected as a consequence.

Annex (an-neks'), n. Something annexed. 'To which I add these two annexes.' Jer. Taylor. Now mainly used in the specific sense, borrowed from the French, of a subsidiary building connected with a great industrial exhibition, in which sense it is commonly written Annexe.

Annexary† (an-neks'a-ri), n. [See ANNEX.] An addition; a supernumerary. Sir E. Sandys.

Annexation (an-neks-ā'shon), n. 1. The act of annexing or uniting at the end; the act of adding, as a smaller thing to a greater; conjunction; addition; the act of connecting; union.—2. We are enabled to unite into a consistent whole the various anomalies and contending principles that are found in the mind and affairs of men. Burke.

2. In music, a small deviation from a perfect interval in tuning instruments with fixed notes; a temperament.—3. In astron. (a) a term used to signify properly the angular distance of a planet from its perihelion, as seen from the sun. It is either true, mean, or eccentric. (b) The angle measuring apparent irregularities in the motion of a planet.—4. In nat. hist. any deviation from the essential characteristics of a specific type.

Anomodontia (a-nom'o-don"shi-a), n. pl. [Gr. anomos, irregular, and odous, odontos, a tooth.] A name given by Owen to an order of extinct reptiles of the trias, either without teeth or having the premaxillaries sheathed with a horny plate like the turtles, or only one pair of canine tusks in the upper jaw, and divided by him into three families in accordance with these distinctions. Called by Huxley Dicynodontia.

Anomœan, Anomean (an-o-mē'an), n. [Gr. anomoios, unlike—an, not, and homoios, like.] One of an extreme sect of Arians, of the fourth century, who denied the similitude of the essence of the Son to that of the Father.

Anomorhomboid (a-nom'o-rom"boid), n. [Gr. anomos, irregular, and E. rhomboid.] An irregular rhomboidal mass, as a crystal of this form.

Anomoura (an-o-mou'ra), n. pl. Same as Anomura.

Anomoural (an-o-mou'ral), a. Same as Anomural.

Anomura (an-o-mū'ra), n. pl. [Gr. anomos, irregular, and oura, a tail.] A section of the crustaceans of the order Decapoda, with irregular tails not formed to assist in swimming, including the hermit-crabs and others. The section is intermediate between the Brachyura or crabs and the Macrura or lobsters. Written also Anomoura.

Anomural (an-o-mū'ral), a. Of or pertaining to the Anomura; irregular in the character of the tail or abdomen; as, anomural crustaceans. Written also Anomoural.

Anomy† (an'o-mi), n. [Gr. anomia—a, priv., and nomos, rule.] A violation of law; lawlessness.

The delights of the body betray us, through our over-indulgence to them, and lead us captive to anomy and disobedience. Glanville.

Anon (a-non'), adv. [A. Sax. on ân, an ân = in one, that is, in one piece or sequence, without break, O.E. anan, anoon, anone.] 1. Forthwith; on the instant; immediately; quickly.

The same is he that heareth the word, and anon with joy receiveth it. Mat. xiii. 20.

2. At another time; thereafter; again; sometimes.

Sometime he trots, anon he rears upright. Shak.

—Ever and anon, every now and then; time after time.

A pouncet-box, which ever and anon
He gave his nose and took't away again. Shak.

Anon. (a-non'). A common contraction for anonymous, especially at the end of literary extracts.

Anona (a-nō'na), n. [From menona, the Malay name.] A genus of plants, the type of the nat. order Anonaceæ. A. squamosa (sweet-sop) grows in the West Indian Islands, and yields an edible fruit having a thick, sweet, luscious pulp. A. muricata (sour-sop) is cultivated in the West and East Indies; it produces a large pear-shaped fruit, of a greenish colour, containing an agreeable slightly acid pulp. The genus produces other edible fruits, as the common custardapple or bullock's heart, from A. reticulata, and the cherimoyer of Peru, from A. Cherimolia.

Anona or Sour-sop (Anona muricata).

Anonaceæ (an-o-nā'sē-ē), n. pl. A natural order of plants, with indefinite stamens and numerous carpels, allied to the magnolias, and consisting of tropical or sub-tropical trees and bushes, that usually abound in a powerful aromatic secretion. The Ethiopian pepper, sour-sop, sweet-sop, and custard-apple are produced by these trees.

Anonymity (a-non-im'i-ti), n. The state or quality of being anonymous or without a name, or of not declaring one's name; anonymousness. 'The rights of anonymity.' Carlyle.

Anonymosity (an-on'i-mos"i-ti), n. State of being anonymous. [Rare.]

Anonymous (a-non'im-us), a. [Gr. anōnymos—neg. prefix an, and onoma, name. See NAME.] 1. Wanting a name; not named and determined as to species.

These animalcules serve also for food to another anonymous insect of the waters. Ray.

2. Without any name acknowledged as that of author, contributor, and the like; as, an anonymous pamphlet; an anonymous subscription; an anonymous supporter; an anonymous author.

Anonymously (a-non'im-us-li), adv. In an anonymous manner; without a name.

I would know whether the edition is to come out anonymously. Swift.

Anonymousness (a-non'im-us-nes), n. State or quality of being anonymous. 'The anonymousness of newspaper writing.' Sir G. C. Lewis.

Anophyta (an-ō-fī'ta), n. pl. [Gr. anō, above, and phyton, a plant.] One of Endlicher's sections of cryptogamic plants, comprising the Hepaticæ (liverworts) and Musci (mosses), which have male and female organs, and free spores in cases, but no spiral vessels.

Anophyte (an'ō-fīt), n. A member of the Anophyta.

Anoplothere (an'op-lo-thēr), n. An individual of the genus Anoplotherium (which see).

Anoplotherium (an'op-lo-thē"ri-um), n. [Gr. neg. prefix an, hoplon, armour, and thērion, a beast.] A fossil genus of extinct even-toed pachydermatous animals, discovered in the gypsum quarries of Paris and fresh-water deposits of the Isle of Wight. A. commune, though much larger, must have resembled the otter in appearance and habits, living in or close to the water. See ANOPLOTHEROIDEA.

Anoplotheroid (an'op-lo-thē"roid), n. A member of the extinct group Anoplotheroidea.

Anoplotheroidea, Anoplotheridæ (an'op-lo-thē-roid"ē-a, an'op-lo-thē"ri-dē), n. pl. An extinct group of omnivorous mammals, from the lower tertiary rocks, forming a kind of connecting link between the swine and the true ruminants. They were slender in form, with long tails, and feet terminated by two hoofed toes each, sometimes with small accessory hoofs. There were six incisors in each jaw, small canines not larger than the incisors, and seven molars on each side. The teeth of the anoplotheroids alone of all animals resemble those of man in being in a continuous series, there being no interval between the molars and the canines.

Anoplura (an-ō-plū'ra), n. pl. [Gr. neg. prefix an, hoplon, a weapon, and oura, a tail.] An order of minute apterous insects, having a mouth formed for suction, and either two simple eyes or none. They are parasitic upon man (three species, Pediculus humanus, P. capitis, and P. pubis, being said to be peculiar to him) and other animals, and are commonly known as lice. They undergo no metamorphosis like other insects, the young differing from the adult in size only, and they shed their skin periodically. See LOUSE, PEDICULUS.

Anopsia (a-nop'si-a), n. [Gr. neg. prefix an, and opsis, sight.] In anat. a case of monstrosity in which the eye and orbit are wanting.

Anopsy† (an'op-si), n. Want of sight. 'Aristotle, who computeth the time of their anopsy or invision by that of their gestation.' Sir T. Browne.

Anorexy (an'o-rek-si), n. [Gr. neg. prefix an, and orexis, a longing after, desire, appetite, from oregō, to reach after.] Want of appetite without a loathing of food.

Anormal (a-nor'mal), a. [L. a, from, and norma, rule.] Not according to rule; abnormal.

Anorthic (an-or'thik), a. [Gr. neg. prefix an, and orthos, straight, right.] 1. Without right angles.—2. In mineral. having unequal oblique axes; as, anorthic felspar.

Anorthite (a-nor'thīt), n. [See ANORTHIC.] A mineral of the felspar family, nearly allied to labradorite, whose crystals are clear and transparent, but small. It is a silicate of alumina and lime.

Anorthoscope (an-or'tho-skōp), n. [Gr. anorthos, not straight—neg. prefix an, orthos, straight, and skopeō, to view.] An instrument for producing a peculiar kind of optical illusion by means of two discs rotating rapidly opposite to each other. The posterior one is transparent, and has certain distorted figures painted upon it; the first one is opaque, but pierced with a number of narrow slits, through which the figures on the posterior disk are viewed. The effect depends on the persistence of impressions on the retina, the instrument being in principle the same as the zoetrope.

Anorthura (an-or-thū'ra), n. [Gr. neg. prefix an, orthos, straight, and oura, a tail.] A name proposed by some naturalists for the genus Troglodytes, that of the wren.

Anosmia (an-os'mi-a), n. [Gr. neg. prefix an, and osmē, smell.] In med. a loss of the sense of smell.

Another (an-uᴛʜ'ėr), a. [An, indefinite art., and other.] 1. Not the same; different; as, we have one form of government, France another; he has become another (different, changed, reformed) man.

He winked, and turned his lips another way. Shak.

2. One more, in addition to a former number; as, grant one request, they will ask another.

Another yet?—a seventh? I'll see no more. Shak.

3. Any other; any different person, indefinitely; any one else. 'Let another praise thee, and not thy own mouth.' Prov. xxvii. 2. Often used without a noun, as a substitute for the name of a person or thing, as in the last example. It is much used in opposition to one; as, one went one way, another another. It is also frequently used with one in a reciprocal sense; as, 'Love one another;' 'Bear ye one another's burdens;' that is, let one love another; bear ye —the one the burdens of another.

Another-gaines† (an-uᴛʜ'ėr-gānz), a. [Corrupted from Another-gates (which see).] Of another kind. Sir P. Sidney.

Another-gates† (an-uᴛʜ'ėr-gāts), a. [Another, and O.E. and Sc. gate, way or manner —es being the adverbial genitive. Gate, like way, means both road and manner. Comp. algates, othergates.] Of another sort. 'Another-gates adventure.' Hudibras.

Another-guess† (an-uᴛʜ'ėr-ges), a. [Corrupted from another-guise.] Of a different kind; different.

My lady Isabella is of another-guess mould than you take her for. H. Walpole.

Burke uses the word another-guess, in which expression are both vulgarity and ignorance. The real term is another-guise; there is nothing of guessing. Landor.

Another-guise† (an-uᴛʜ'ėr-gīz), a. [Another, guise, way, manner. See GUISE.] Of a different kind; different.

Anotta, Anotto (a-not'ta, a-not'tō), n. Same as Arnotto.

Anoura (an-ou'ra), n. pl. See ANURA.

Anŏus (an'o-us), n. [Gr. a-noos—a, without, and nous, mind, intellect.] A genus of sea-birds, family Laridæ, or gulls, rare in Britain, but common in tropical seas. The best known species, A. stolidus or 'noddy,' often alights on vessels at night, and, as it does not see well except by daylight, allows itself to be easily caught. It is about 15 inches long. The eggs are good eating, and sailors collect them largely when at the places where they are to be got.

Anoxæmia, Anoxyhæmia (an-oks-ē'mi-a, an-ok'si-hē"mi-a), n. [Prefix an, priv., ox-, oxy-, from oxygen, and Gr. haima, blood.] A deficiency of oxygen in the blood.

Ansa (au'sa), n. pl. Ansæ (an'sē). [L. ansa, a handle.] 1. In archæol. a handle, as of a vase or dish of some kind, often more or less of an ornamental character.—2. In astron. either of the parts of Saturn's ring which are to be seen on each side of the planet when viewed through a telescope: so called because they are like handles to the body of the planet.—3. In anat. a loop formed by some vessel or structure.

Ansated (an'sāt-ed), a. [L. ansatus, from ansa, a handle.] Having a handle or handles, or something in the form of handles.

Anse (ans), n. [L. ansa, a handle.] A name for one of the handles of a cannon of old type. These handles, especially in some old foreign pieces, were often cast in the form of dolphins, serpents, &c.

Ansellia (an-sel'li-a), n. [After Mr. Ansell, a collector, who found the plant growing on the stems of the oil-palm at Fernando Po.] A genus of orchids, with great panicles of greenish flowers spotted with purple. Only one species (A. africana) is known; it is found both on the west and east coasts of tropical Africa, growing to the height of 2 feet.

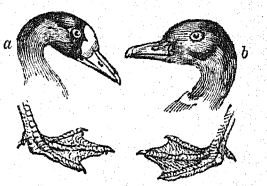
Anserated.

Anser (an'sėr), n. [L.] 1. A genus of birds, family Anseridæ. See GOOSE.—2. In astron. a small star in the Milky Way, between the Swan and Eagle.

Anserated (an'sėr-āt-ed), a. In her. a term applied to a cross, the extremities of which are formed into the shape of the heads of lions, eagles, serpents, &c.

Anseres (an'sėr-ēz), n. pl. [L. pl. of anser, a goose.] In Linnæus' system, the third order of birds, equivalent to the Natatores of modern naturalists. See NATATORES.

Anseridæ (an-sėr'i-dē), n. pl. A family of web-footed birds, containing the geese proper (genus Anser), distinguished by having the bill not longer than the head, and thicker at the base than it is broad; they have longer



Characters of Anseridæ.

Answerlessly (an'sėr-les-li), adv. In an answerless manner; in a way that cannot be answered; in a way of insufficient answer. 'Answered indeed; but, as he said, answerlessly.' Bp. Hall.

An't† (an't). A contraction of an it, that is, if it. See AN.

An't (ānt). Same as Ain't.

Ant (ant), n. [From A. Sax. æmete, an emmet (like aunt, from L. amita). See EMMET.] An emmet; a pismire; a hymenopterous insect of the family Formicidæ and genus Formica. Ants live in communities, and the internal economy of their nest or hillock presents an extraordinary example of the results of combined industry. Each community consists of males with four wings; of females much larger than the males, and possessing wings only during the pairing season; and of barren females, otherwise called neuters, workers, or nurses, destitute of wings. The females lay their eggs in parcels of six or more. The males and females desert the nest soon after becoming perfect. The male, like the drone-bee, becomes useless after impregnating the female. The grubs spin a cocoon, and become pupæ, which resemble barley-corns, and are popularly taken for eggs. Under the names of ants' brood, ants' eggs, they are an article of import in some northern countries for making formic acid; dissolved in water, they are used for vinegar in Norway. The young grubs are fed by the females and by the nurses, who are also the formers of the streets and galleries, &c., of the colony, and the performers generally of the work of the community. There are many species of ants, from the operations they perform called mining-ants, carpenters, masons, &c. The favourite food of ants is honey, particularly honey-dew excreted by aphides; but they also live on fruits, insects and their larvæ, and on dead birds and mammals. They are torpid in winter. Ants are bolder than any animal of the same size. Those of the same or different species have pitched battles, and capture slaves or take larvæ from other nests. Some species have stings, others squirt out an irritant fluid (formic acid). There are a dozen British species, the largest being the Formica rufa, the red or horse ant, ¼ inch long, which raises hills nearly as large as a small hay-cock. The name ant is also given to insects of the neuropterous genus Termes. See TERMITES.

Ant (ant), n. A native name in some parts of India for a credit account.

Anta (an'ta), n. The Brazilian native name of the common or American tapir (Tapirus americanus).

Anta (an'ta), n. pl. Antæ (an'tē). [L. antæ; connected with ante, before, Gr. anti, against.] In arch. a pilaster, especially a pilaster in certain positions, as on each side of a door or standing opposite a pillar; more specifically, the species of pilaster or pillar used in Greek and Roman architecture to terminate the side walls of temples when they are prolonged beyond the face of the end walls. A portico in antis is formed when the side walls are prolonged in this way and when columns stand between the antæ.

Antacid (ant-as'id), n. [Gr. anti, against, and E. acid.] In phar. an alkali, or a remedy for acidity in the stomach. Dyspepsia and diarrhœa are the diseases in which antacids are chiefly employed. The principal antacids in use are potash, soda, ammonia, magnesia, lime, and their carbonates.

Antacid (ant-as'id), a. Counteracting acidity.

Antacrid (ant-ak'rid), n. [Gr. anti, against, and E. acrid.] That which corrects acrimony of the secretions.

Antagoge (an-ta-gō'jē), n. [Gr. anti, against, and agō, to drive.] Same as Antanagoge (which see).

Antagonism (an-tag'ō-nizm), n. [Gr. antagōnisma, a struggle.] The act of contending against; opposition of action; counteraction or contrariety of things or principles.

And, toppling over all antagonism,
So waxed in pride, that I believed myself Unconquerable. Tennyson.

Antagonist (an-tag'ō-nist), n. [Gr. antagōnistēs—anti, against, and agōnistēs, a champion, a combatant, from agōn, a contest (whence agony).] 1. One who contends with another in combat or in argument; an opponent; a competitor; an adversary. 'Antagonists of Heaven's mighty king.' Milton. 'Our antagonists in these controversies.' Bp. Hooker.—2. In anat. a muscle which acts in opposition to another; as, a flexor, which bends a part, is the antagonist of an extensor, which extends it.—Adversary, Antagonist, Enemy. See ADVERSARY.

Antagonist (an-tag'ō-nist), a. Counteracting; opposing; combating; as, an antagonist muscle. The flexors and extensors of a limb are antagonist muscles, as also the abductors and adductors.

Antagonistic, Antagonistical (an-tag'ō-nist"ik, an-tag'ō-nist"ik-al), a. Contending against; acting in opposition; opposing; opposite; antagonist.

Their valours are not yet so combatant,
Or truly antagonistic, as to fight. B. Jonson.

Antagonistic (an-tag'ō-nist"ik), n. Something that acts as in an antagonistic manner; specifically, a muscle whose action counteracts that of another.

In anatomy those muscles are termed antagonistics which are opposed to others in their action, as the extensors to the flexors, &c. Brande and Cox.

Antagonistically (an-tag'ō-nis"tik-al-li), adv. In an antagonistical manner.

Antagonize (an-tag'ō-nīz), v.i. pret. & pp. antagonized; ppr. antagonizing. [Gr. antagōnizomai, to contend against.] To contend against; to act in opposition.

The effect does not depend on a single principle, but on two antagonizing principles. J. S. Mill.

Antagony† (an-tag'ō-ni), n. [Gr. antagōnia —anti, against, and agōnia, a contest.] Contest; opposition. 'The incommunicable antagony that is between Christ and Belial.' Milton.

Antal (ant'al), n. A wine-measure of about 116 gallons, used in the Tokay district of Hungary.

Antalgic (an-tal'jik), n. [Gr. anti, against, and algos, pain.] A medicine to alleviate pain; an anodyne.

Antalgic (an-tal'jik), a. [See noun.] Alleviating pain; anodyne. [Rare.]

Antalkali, Antalkaline (ant-al'ka-li or ant-al'ka-lī, ant-al'ka-līn), n. [Gr. ant for anti, against, and E. alkali.] A substance which neutralizes an alkali, and is used medicinally to counteract an alkaline tendency in the system. All true acids have this power; the so-called carbonic acid, which does not possess it, being properly an anhydride.

Antalkaline (ant-al'ka-līn), a. Having the property of neutralizing alkalies.

Antanaclasis (ant-an'a-klā"sis), n. [Gr., a bending or breaking back—anti, against, ana, back, and klasis, from klaō, to break.] 1. In rhet. a figure which consists in repeating the same word in a different sense; as, whilst we live, let us live; learn some craft when young, that when old you may live without craft.—2. In gram. a repetition of words beginning a sentence after a long parenthesis; as, 'shall that heart (which not only feels them, but which has all motions of life placed in them), shall that heart,' &c.

Antanagoge (ant-an'a-gō"jē), n. [Gr. anti, against, and anagōgē, a taking up. See ANAGOGE.] In rhet. a figure which consists in replying to an adversary by way of recrimination; as, when the accusation of one party is unanswerable, the accused person charges him with the same or some other crime.

Antaphrodisiac (ant-af'ro-diz"i-ak), a. [Gr. anti, against, and aphrodisios, venereal, from Aphroditē, Venus.] Antivenereal; having the quality of extinguishing or lessening venereal desire.

Antaphrodisiac (ant-af'ro-diz"i-ak), n. A medicine that lessens or extinguishes the venereal appetite.

Antaphroditic (ant-af'ro-dit"ik), n. and a. [Gr. See ANTAPHRODISIAC.] Same as Antaphrodisiac.

Antapoplectic (ant-ap'ō-plek"tik), a. [Gr. anti, against, and E. apoplectic.] Efficacious against apoplexy.

Antarchism (ant-ar'kizm), n. [Gr. anti, and archē, government.] Opposition to all government, or restraint of individuals by law. [Rare.]

Antarchist (ant-ar'kist), n. One who opposes all social government, or control of individuals by law. [Rare.]

Antarchistic, Antarchistical (ant-ar-kis'tik, ant-ar-kis'tik-al), a. Opposed to all human government. [Rare.]

Antarctic (ant-ärk'tik), a. [L. antarcticus, Gr. antarktikos—anti, against, and arktos, the north, properly the Bear, a northern constellation. See ARCTIC.] Opposite to the northern or arctic pole; relating to the southern pole or to the region near it, and applied especially to a circle parallel to the equator and distant from the pole 23° 28′, the line between light and darkness when the sun is on the tropic of Capricorn. Thus we say the antarctic pole, antarctic circle, antarctic current, Antarctic Ocean, or antarctic region.

Antares (ant-ār'ēz), n. The Arabic name of α Scorpii, a star of the first magnitude, and the principal star of the constellation Scorpio: called also the Scorpion's Heart.

Antarthritic (ant-är-thrit'ik), a. [Gr. anti, against, and arthritis, gout.] Counteracting the gout.

Antarthritic (ant-är-thrit'ik), n. A remedy which cures or alleviates the gout.

Antasthmatic (ant-ast-mat'ik), a. [Gr. anti, against, and asthma, asthma.] Fitted to relieve asthma.

Antasthmatic (ant-ast-mat'ik), n. A remedy for asthma.

Antatrophic (an-ta-trof'ik), a. [Gr. anti, against, and atrophia, a wasting away.] Efficacious against atrophy or consumption.

Antatrophic (an-ta-trof'ik), n. A medicine for the cure of atrophy or consumption.

Ant-bear (ant'bâr), n. A name sometimes given to the larger species of ant-eaters, but generally restricted to Myrmecophaga jubata, a native of the warmer parts of South America. It is from 4 to 5 feet in length from the tip of the long, slender, toothless muzzle to the origin of the black, bushy tail, which is about two feet long. The body is covered with long hair, particularly along the neck and back. There are four strong curved claws on the fore feet, and it has five on the hind ones. With these claws it tears down the ant-hills and sweeps the ants into its mouth with its long extensile glutinous tongue, an action that can be repeated with marvellous rapidity. It is a harmless and solitary animal, and spends most of its time in sleep. Called also Tamanoir and Great Ant-eater.

Ant-bear (Myrmecophaga jubata).

Ant-bird (ant'bêrd), n. A name common to the members of the family Formicariidæ (which see).

Ant-catcher (ant'kach-èr), n. Same as Ant-thrush (which see).

Ante (an'tē). [L. ante, before, locally or in time, akin to Gr. anti, against; A. Sax. and Icel. prefix and-, an- (as in answer), Goth. and (prep. and prefix), anda- (prefix), &c.] A Latin preposition much used in the composition of English words, especial y in words from the Latin language. It signifies before in place or time.—Ante meridiem, before mid-day, usually contracted A.M.

Anté (an'te), a. [For Fr. enté, pp. of enter, to engraft.] Ingrafted: a term extensively used by foreign heralds, but employed by British heralds only in the cases of the arms of King Philip, consort of Queen Mary, and of the royal arms, as they were borne during the time our kings were also sovereigns of Hanover.

Anteal (an'tē-al), a. Being before or in front. [Rare.]

Ant-eater (ant'ēt-èr), n. A name sometimes given to mammals of various genera that prey chiefly on ants, but usually confined to the edentate genus Myrmecophaga. In this genus the whole head is remarkably elongated, the jaws are perfectly destitute of teeth, and the mouth is furnished with a long, narrow, cylindrical, extensile tongue covered with glutinous saliva, by the aid of which the animals secure their insect prey. The eyes are particularly small, the ears short and round, and the legs, especially the anterior, very robust, and furnished with long, compressed, acute nails, admirably adapted for breaking into the ant-hills. The most remarkable species is the Myrmecophaga jubata, or ant-bear (which see). Two other species, M. Tamandua or Tamandua tetradactyla, and M. didactyla or Cyclothurus didactylus, are smaller in size, have a less elongated snout, and are adapted for climbing trees in quest of the insects on which they feed, their prehensile tails standing them in good stead in such forays. All are natives of South America. The name ant-eater is also given to the pangolins (see PANGOLIN), and to the aardvark. (See ORYCTEROPUS.) The Echidnæ of Australia are sometimes called porcupine ant-eaters. See ECHIDNA. See also MYRMECOBIUS.

Antebrachial (an-tē-brā'ki-al), a. [L. ante, before, and brachium, the arm.] In anat. of or pertaining to the fore-arm: usually, but less correctly, written Antibrachial.

Antecedaneous (an'tē-sē-dā"nē-us), a. [From antecede.] Antecedent; preceding in time. 'Capable of antecedaneous proof.' Barrow.

Antecede (an-tē-sēd'), v.t. [L. ante, before, and cedo, to go. See CEDE.] To go before in time; to precede.

It seems consonant to reason that the fabric of the world did not long antecede its motion. Sir M. Hale.

Antecedence (an-tē-sē'dens), n. 1. The act or state of going before in time; precedence. Sir M. Hale.—2. In astron. an apparent motion of a planet toward the west, or contrary to the order of the signs.

Antecedency (an-tē-sē'den-si), n. Same as Antecedence.

Unity is before any multiplied number. Which antecedency of unity he (Dionysius) applieth unto the Deity. Bp. Hacket.

Antecedent (an-tē-sē'dent), a. Going before in time; prior; anterior; preceding; as, an event antecedent to the deluge. In med. (a) Antecedent signs, the precursory symptoms of a disease. (b) Antecedent cause, the exciting cause of a disease.—SYN. Prior, anterior, preceding, previous, foregoing.

Antecedent (an-tē-sē'dent), n. 1. One who or that which goes before in time or place.

He's everything indeed . . .
My antecedent or my gentleman-usher. Massinger.

2. In gram. the noun to which a relative or other pronoun refers; as, Solomon was the prince who built the temple, where the word prince is the antecedent of who.—3. In logic, (a) that member of a hypothetical or conditional proposition which contains the condition, and which is introduced by if or some equivalent word or words; as, if the sun is fixed, the earth must move. Here the first and conditional proposition is the antecedent, the second the consequent. (b) The premises of a syllogism taken together. 4. In math. the first of two terms of a ratio, or that which is compared with the other. Thus if the ratio be that of 2 to 3, or of a to b; then 2 or a is the antecedent.—5. pl. The earlier events of a man's life; previous course, conduct, action, or avowed principles.

We have learned lately to speak of men's antecedents: the phrase is newly come up; and it is common to say, 'If we would know what a man really now is, we must know his antecedents,' that is, what he has been in past time. Abp. Trench.

Antecedental (an'tē-sē-den"tal), a. Relating to what is antecedent or goes before.—Antecedental method, a branch of general geometrical proportion, or universal comparison of ratios.

Antecedently (an-tē-sē'dent-li), adv. Previously; at a time preceding.

We consider him antecedently to his creation, while he yet lay in the barren womb of nothing, and only in the number of possibilities. South.

Antecessor (an-tē-ses'èr), n. [L. See ANTECEDE.] 1. One who goes before; a leader; a principal. 'A venerable regard not inferior to any of his antecessors.' Wood. 'Much higher than any of its antecessors.' Carlyle. [Now rare.]—2.† A title given to those who excelled in any science, and to professors of civil law.—3.† In law, one that possessed land before the present possessor; an ancestor.

The antecessor was most commonly he that possessed the lands in King Edward's time before the Conquest. Brady.

Ante-chamber (an'tē-chām-bèr), n. [Prefix ante, before, and chamber.] A chamber or apartment before the chief apartment, to which it leads, and in which persons wait for audience.

They both were cast into the dungeon's gloom,
That dismal ante-chamber of the tomb.
Longfellow.

Ante-chapel (an'tē-chap-el), n. The vestibule or apartment through which a chapel is entered; a narthex. T. Warton.

Ante-cursor (an-tē-kėr'sėr), n. [L. ante, before, and cursor, a runner, from curro, to run. See COURSE.] One who runs before; a forerunner; a harbinger. Bailey.

Antedate (an'tē-dāt), n. [Prefix ante, before, and date.] 1. Prior date; a date antecedent to another. —2.† Foretaste; anticipation.

Why hath not my soul these apprehensions, these presages, these changes, those antedates, those jealousies, those suspicions of a sin, as well as my body of a sickness? Donne.

Antedate (an'tē-dāt), v.t. pret. & pp. antedated; ppr. antedating. 1. To date before the true time, or beforehand; to give an earlier date than the real one to; thus, to antedate a deed or bond is to give it a date anterior to the true time of its execution.—2. To anticipate; to experience, or to give effect to, something before it is due or expected. 'And antedate the bliss above.' Pope.

No hostile hand can antedate my doom. Pope.

Antediluvial (an'tē-di-lū"vi-al), a. Same as Antediluvian.

Antediluvian (an'tē-di-lū"vi-an), a. [L. ante, before, and diluvium, a flood.] Before the flood or deluge in Noah's time; existing, happening, or relating to what happened before the deluge. 'The antediluvian earth.' Woodward. 'Antediluvian chronology.' Sir T. Browne.

Antediluvian (an'tē-di-lū"vi-an), n. One who lived before the deluge. 'The longevity of the antediluvians.' Bentley.

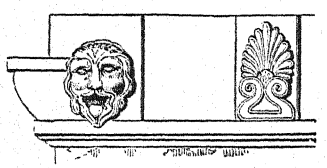
Ante-fact† (an'tē-fakt), n. That which prefigures a fact before it occurs. [Rare.]

There is a proper sacrifice in the Lord's supper, to exhibit Christ's death in the post-fact, as there was a sacrifice to prefigure, in the old law, the ante-fact.—Copie of the Proceedings of some Divines, 1641.

Antefixæ, Antefixes (an-tē-fiks'ē, an-tē-fiks'ez), n. pl. [L. ante, before, and fixus, fixed.] In class. arch.: (a) upright ornaments, generally of marble or terra cotta, at the eaves of a tiled roof opposite the end of each ridge of tiling to conceal the joinings of the tiles. (b) Ornaments in the shape of animals' heads or other figures placed below the eaves of a building, and through the mouths or other perforations of which the water from the roof is allowed to escape.



Antefixæ.

Anteflexion (an-tē-flek'shon), n. [L. ante, before, and flecto, flexum, to bend.] In obstetrics, a forward inclination of the body of the uterus, without displacement of the os uteri.

Ant-egg (ant'eg), n. One of a quantity of little white bodies found in the hillocks of ants, usually supposed to be their eggs, but really the young brood in the state of larvæ or pupæ.

Antejuramentum (an-tē-jū'ra-men"tum), n. [L. ante, before, and juramentum, an oath, from juro, to swear.] In law, an oath taken by the accuser and accused before any trial or purgation. The accuser swore that he would prosecute, and the accused had to swear on the day of ordeal that he was innocent. Wharton.

Antelope (an'tē-lōp), n. [Origin doubtful. Some derive it from a Gr. antholops, an antelope, supposed to be compounded of anthos, a flower, and ōps, an eye.] A name applied to many species of ruminant mammals closely resembling the deer in general appearance, but essentially different in nature from them. The antelopes are included with the sheep and oxen in the section Cavicornia or 'hollow-horned' ruminants. Their horns, unlike those of the deer, are not deciduous, but are permanent, each consisting essentially of a process of the frontal bone—the core of the horn—covered by a sheath of horny material. Their horns are never branched as those of the deer usually are; they are, however, often twisted spirally, and may be borne by both sexes. They are found in greatest number and variety in Africa, from which continent deer, with one or two exceptions, are entirely absent. Among the antelopes we may mention the chamois, the saiga (the only two European species), the gazelle, the addax, the eland, the koodoo, the gnu, the sasin or Indian antelope, and the prong-buck of America. By some naturalists they are formed into a family (Antilopidæ) or sub-family (Antilopina) divided into genera, by others almost the whole of them are included in the genus Antilope.

Antelucan (an-tē-lū'kan), a. [L. antelucanus—ante, before, and lux, light.] Being before light; preceding the dawn; specifically applied to assemblies of Christians, in ancient times held before light in the morning, either to escape persecution, or to commemorate the hour of the resurrection.

Antelucan worship possibly having reference to the ineffable mystery of the resurrection—all the evangelists agreeing that it was very early in the morning, and one saying 'while it was yet dark.' De Quincey.

Antemeridian (an'tē-mē-rid"i-an), a. [Prefix ante, before, and meridian.] Being before noon; pertaining to the forenoon.

The anthem may be for one, two, or any number of voices, but seldom exceeds five parts, and may or may not have an organ accompaniment written for it.

Anthemion (an-thē'mi-on), n. [Gr., from anthos, a flower.] That ornament or ornamental series used in Greek and Roman decoration, which is derived from floral forms, more especially the honeysuckle. It was much used for the ornamentation of antefixæ and friezes in architecture, and for interior decoration; also for the painted decoration of fictile vases, and for the borders of dresses. The so-called honeysuckle is alternated generally with some other floral form.

Anthemion, from pediment of temple, Phigalia.

Anthemis (an'thē-mis), n. [Gr., from anthos, a flower.] A genus of plants, nat. order Compositæ, sub-order Corymbiferæ. A. Cotula is the may-weed or stinking chamomile; A. nobilis is the common chamomile, found in pastures in England. The flowers contain a bitter principle, which has tonic properties, and an aromatic fragrance obtained from an essential oil. They are consequently much used as a light tonic, and also as a fomentation or poultice.

Anthemwise (an'them-wīz), adv. In the manner of an anthem; alternately.

> Several quires, placed one over against another, and taking the voice by catches, anthemwise, give great pleasure. Bacon.

Anther (an'thėr), n. [Gr. anthēros, flowery, from anthos, a flower.] In bot. the essential part of the stamen. It is a capsule (b), commonly with two lobes or cells, each opening by a slit or pore when mature, and discharging a powder, usually of a yellow colour, which fertilizes the ovules (a) by falling or being deposited on the stigma (c). The anther is generally borne at the end of a stalk or filament, but it is sometimes sessile. Theoretically, it is a contracted leaf with its parenchyma converted into pollen, and its midrib rendered fleshy, and connecting the two lobes. It is called by Ray the apex, and by Malpighi the capsula staminis.

b b, Anthers.

Antheral (an'thėr-al), a. Pertaining to anthers.

Anther-dust (an'thėr-dust), n. The dust or pollen of an anther.

Anthericum (an-ther'i-kum), n. [From Gr. antherix, antherikos, the stalk of a kind of asphodel, from anthos, a flower.] A large genus of plants, nat. order Liliaceæ, with racemes or panicles of white flowers. The flowers of A. Liliastrum, the St. Bruno's lily, are sweet-scented, and have a dark green spot on each segment.

Antherid (an'thėr-id), n. Same as Antheridium.

Antheridian (an-thėr-id'i-an), a. In bot. of or pertaining to the antheridium; as, antheridian cells.

Antheridium (an-thėr-id'i-um), n. pl. Antheridia (an-thėr-id'i-a). [A neo-Latin dim. from E. anther, and Gr. eidos, form.] In bot. the organ in cryptogamic plants which answers to the anther in phanerogams. It is very different in its nature and position in the different groups.

Antheriferous (an-thėr-if'ėr-us), a. [Anther, and L. fero, to bear.] In bot. (a) producing anthers. (b) Supporting anthers, as the filaments.

Antheriform (an-thėr'i-form), a. [Anther, and L. forma, form.] Having the form of an anther.

Antherogenous (an-thėr-oj'en-us), a. [Anther, and Gr. root gen, to produce.] In bot. a term applied to double flowers, in which the anthers are converted into horn-like petals, as in the double columbine.

Antheroid (an'thėr-oid), a. [Anther, and Gr. eidos, resemblance.] Resembling an anther.

Antherozoid (an'thėr-ō-zō-id), n. [Anther, and zooid (which see).] In bot. the minute body produced in the antheridium of cryptogams by which the female organs are fertilized. The antherozoids are slender spiral threads with a somewhat thickened apex, which are produced in the antheridian cells; when mature they burst the cell, and move freely about.

Anthesis (an-thē'sis), n. [Gr., from antheō, to bloom, from anthos, a flower.] The period when flowers expand; the act of expansion in a flower. Gray.

Anthiarine (an-thī'a-rin), n. See ANTIARINE.

Ant-hill, Ant-hillock (ant'hil, ant'hil-ok), n. A little tumulus or hillock formed by ants for their habitation, and composed of earth, leaves, twigs, &c. In tropical climates the nests of some species of the white ant (Termites) are found 12 feet high, in the form of pyramids or cones, and from their height and number sometimes appear at a distance like a small village. See TERMITE.

Anthine (an'thin), a. [Gr. anthos, a flower.] Of or pertaining to a flower.

Anthobian (an-thō'bi-an), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and bios, life.] A beetle that lives on flowers.

Anthocarpous (an-tho-kär'pus), a. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and karpos, fruit.] In bot. a term applied to fruits formed by masses of inflorescences adhering to each other, as the fir-cone, pine-apple, &c.

Anthochæra (an'tho-kē-ra), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and chairō, to delight in.] A genus of Australian insessorial birds, family Meliphagidæ, or honey-suckers. A. mellivora, the bush wattle-bird, is found wherever there are banksias, in New South Wales, South Australia, and Tasmania. Its notes are harsh and peculiar, resembling the sound made by a person vomiting, whence its local name, Googwarruck. It feeds on the blossoms of the banksias.

Anthocyanin, Anthocyanine (an-tho-sī'an-in), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and kyanos, blue.] The blue colouring matter of plants. See CYANIN.

Anthodium (an-thō'di-um), n. [Gr. anthōdēs, like flowers, full of flowers—anthos, a flower, and eidos, likeness, form.] In bot. the head of flowers of composite plants, as of a thistle or daisy. An anthodium is a depressed spike, consisting of many distinct flowers on a common receptacle, and surrounded by a set of floral leaves or bracts, called an involucre.

Antholite (an'tho-līt), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and lithos, a stone.] In geol. the general name for the impress of the inflorescence of plants on rocks, as on the shales of the coal-measures.

Anthological (an-tho-loj'ik-al), a. Pertaining to anthology; consisting of beautiful extracts, especially from the poets.

Anthology (an-thol'o-ji), n. [Gr. anthologia, from anthologos, flower-gathering—anthos, a flower, and legō, to gather. Anthologiai were collections of small Greek poems, picked out and made up, as it were, into a nosegay.] 1. A discourse on flowers. [Rare.] 2. A collection of flowers; a garland. [Rare.] 3. A collection of beautiful passages from authors; a collection of poems or epigrams, particularly a collection of such short poetical pieces, the work of a large number of different Greek or Latin authors.—4. In the Greek Ch. a collection of devotional pieces.

Antholysis (an-thol'i-sis), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and lysis, a breaking up.] In bot. the retrograde change of the parts of a floral whorl, as the stamens changing more or less completely into petals, or the petals into sepals.

Anthomania (an-tho-mā'ni-a), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and mania, madness.] An extravagant fondness for curious flowers.

Anthomyia (an-tho-mī'i-a), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and myia, a fly.] A genus of flies, including the cabbage, potato, turnip, beet, and lettuce fly.

Anthomyzidæ (an-tho-miz'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and myzō, to murmur.] A division of the Muscidæ (flies), composed of species having the appearance of common flies. The wings are vibratile, the legs of moderate size, and the abdomen composed of four joints.

Anthony's Fire (an'tō-niz fīr), n. Same as Saint Anthony's Fire.

Anthophore, Anthophorum (an'tho-fōr, an-thof'o-rum), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and pherein, to bear.] In bot. a columnar process arising from the bottom of the calyx, and having at its apex the petals, stamens, and pistil.

Anthophyllite (an-thof'il-īt), n. [L.L. anthophyllum, a clove, from Gr. anthos, a flower, and phyllon, a leaf. From its colour.] A clove-brown variety of hornblende, occurring in radiating columnar aggregates; tremolite.

Anthophyllitic (an-thof'il-lit''ik), a. Pertaining to anthophyllite, or containing it.

Anthorism, Anthorismus (an'thor-izm, an-tho-riz'mus), n. [Gr. anthorismos—anti, opposite, and horismos, a marking out, a definition, from horos, a boundary.] In rhet. a description or definition contrary to that which is given by the adverse party.

Anthosiderite (an-tho-sid'ėr-īt), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and sidēritēs, of iron.] A native silicate of iron, of an ochreous-yellow colour inclining to yellowish-brown, having a fibrous radiated structure, and found at Antonio Pereira, in Minas Geraes, Brazil.

Anthotaxis (an-tho-taks'is), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and taxis, order.] In bot. the arrangement of flowers on the axis of growth. Called also Inflorescence.

Anthoxanthin, Anthoxanthine (an-tho-zan'thin), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and xanthos, yellow.] The yellow colouring matter of plants; xanthin (which see).

Anthoxanthum (an-tho-zan'thum), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and xanthos, yellow.] A genus of grasses the flowers of which have only two stamens. A. odoratum is well known to farmers under the name of sweet vernal-grass or spring-grass. The peculiar odour of new hay is chiefly due to its presence. See SPRING-GRASS.

Anthozasia (an-tho-zā'si-a), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and zaō, to live.] In bot. the process of the leaves of a plant assuming the appearance of petals.

Anthozoa (an-tho-zō'a), n. pl. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and zōon, a living creature.] A term formerly used to embrace such flower-like animals as are now generally classed among the Actinozoa (which see).

Anthozoic (an-tho-zō'ik), a. Pertaining to the Anthozoa.

Anthracene (an'thra-sēn), n. [See ANTHRACITE.] Paranaphthaline (which see). See also ALIZARINE.

Anthraciferous (an-thra-sif'ėr-us), a. [Gr. anthrax, anthrakos, coal, and L. fero, to bear.] Yielding anthracite: applied to geological strata.

Anthracin (an'thra-sin), n. Same as Anthracene.

Anthracite (an'thra-sīt), n. [Gr. anthrax, anthrakos, a burning coal.] Glance or blind coal, a non-bituminous coal of a shining lustre, approaching to metallic, and which burns without smoke, with a weak or no flame, and with intense heat. It consists of, on an average, 90 per cent. carbon, 3 hydrogen, and 5 ashes. There are several varieties known as massive, slaty, and columnar. It has some of the properties of coke or charcoal, and, like that substance, represents an extreme metamorphism of coal under the influence of heat or of volcanic disturbance. It is found in England, Scotland, and Ireland, and in large quantities in the United States.

Anthracitic (an-thra-sit'ik), a. Pertaining to anthracite.

Anthracolite (an-thrak'o-līt), n. Same as Anthracite.

Anthracometer (an-thra-kom'et-ėr), n. [Gr. anthrax, anthrakos, carbon, and metron, a measure.] An instrument for ascertaining the quantity of carbonic acid gas present in any case.

Anthraconite (an-thrak'on-īt), n. [Gr. anthrax, anthrakos, coal.] A variety of marble of a coal-black lustre, occurring at Kilkenny. The blackness is due to the presence of bitumen. It gives off a fetid sulphureo-bituminous odour when heated, and is hence known under the popular name of Stinkstone.

Anthracosaurus (an-thrak'ō-są''rus), n. [Gr. anthrax, anthrakos, coal, and sauros, a lizard.] A labyrinthodont animal, first found in the carboniferous strata of the west of Scotland. The head measured 18 inches in length.

Anthracothere (an-thrak'o-thēr), n. Same as Anthracotherium.

Anthracotherium (an'thra-ko-thē''ri-um), n. [Gr. anthrax, anthrakos, a coal, and thērion, a beast.] An extinct pachydermatous mammal, somewhat resembling a hog, allied to the palæotheria, so named because it was at first only found in the miocene lignite or anthracite of Tuscany. It is now found in other deposits.

Anthrax (an'thraks), n. [Gr.] 1. In med. a carbuncle; a malignant ulcer, with intense burning sensation.—2. An ancient name for a certain gem; carbuncle, ruby, or garnet. 3. Lithanthrax, or pit or stone coal.

Anthrenus (an-thrē'nus), n. [Gr. anthrēnē, a hornet.] A genus of coleopterous insects, family Dermestidæ, whose larvæ, especially that of A. or Dermestes museorum, are the pests of our museums, on account of their ravages on specimens of dried animals.

Anthriscus (an-thris'kus), n. [L., the name of a plant described by Pliny resembling Scandix.] A genus of plants, nat. order Umbelliferæ, with thin, finely-divided leaves and small white flowers. There are two British species, besides a third (A. cerefolium), now found wild, but originating in an escape from our gardens, well known as a salad and pot herb under the name of garden chervil.

Anthropic (an-throp'ik), a. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man.] Belonging to man; man-like; sprung from man.

> The Greeks in their great age are assumed to have been a purely Aryan people, speaking a language closely allied to Sanskrit; yet their religion is not that of the Vedas or the Zend Avesta. . . . Their gods are anthropic, and belong to an ancestral worshipping people. Quart. Rev.

Anthropidæ (an-throp'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man.] Huxley's name for the highest group of mammals, of which man is the only genus and species; the Bimana.

Anthropoglot (an-throp'ō-glot), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and glōtta, the tongue.] An animal which has a tongue resembling that of man, as the parrot.

Anthropography (an-thrō-pog'ra-fi), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and graphē, a description.] A description of man or of the human race; more particularly, that branch of physical geography which treats of the actual distribution of the human race, as distinguished by physical character, language, institutions, and customs. See ETHNOGRAPHY.

Anthropoid (an'thrō-poid), a. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and eidos, resemblance.] Resembling man: specifically applied to such apes as most closely approach the human race, as the gorilla and chimpanzee.

> The gorilla is now generally regarded as the most human of the anthropoid apes. H. A. Nicholson.

Anthropoides (an-thrō-poi'dēz), n. A genus of grallatorial birds, family Gruidæ, including the demoiselle, the Stanley, and crowned cranes.

Anthropolatry (an-thrō-pol'a-tri), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and latreia, service, worship.] Lit. the worship of man—a charge brought by the early Christians against the ancient heathens, and retorted by the latter on the Christians, on account of their worship of Christ. The word, however, is better known from its employment by the Apollinarians against the orthodox Christians of the fourth and fifth centuries, who held the doctrine of the perfect human nature of Christ.

Anthropolite (an-thrō'pō-līt), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and lithos, a stone.] A petrifaction of the human body or skeleton, or of parts of the body, by the incrusting action of calcareous waters, and hence hardly to be considered fossil or sub-fossil.

Anthropologic, Anthropological (an-thrō'pō-loj''ik, an-thrō'pō-loj''ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining to anthropology.—2. According to human manner of speaking. 'Anthropologic wisdom.' Kingsley.

Anthropologist (an-thrō-pol'o-jist), n. One who writes on or studies anthropology.

Anthropology (an-thrō-pol'o-ji), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and logos, discourse.] 1. A discourse upon human nature. [Rare.]—2. That manner of expression by which the inspired writers attribute human parts and passions to God. [Rare.]—3. The science of man and mankind, including the study of man's place in nature, that is, of the measure of his agreement with and divergence from other animals; of his physical structure and psychological nature, together with the extent to which these act and react on each other; of the various tribes of men, determining how these may have been produced or modified by external conditions, and consequently taking account also of the advance or retrogression of the human race. Anthropology is thus much more extensive in its scope than ethnology, which concerns itself only with the last of these branches. It puts under contribution all sciences which have man for their object, as archæology, comparative anatomy, physiology, psychology, climatology, &c. By some anthropology has been divided as follows:—(a) Zoological anthropology, which investigates man's relations to the brute creation; (b) Descriptive anthropology or ethnology, describing the divisions and groups of mankind; (c) General anthropology, or, as M. Broca calls it, the 'biology of the human race.' This last is anthropology proper.

Anthropomancy (an-thrō'po-man-si), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and manteia, divination.] Divination by inspecting the entrails of a human being.

Anthropometry (an-thrō-pom'et-ri), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and metron, measure.] The measurement of the human body.

Anthropomorphic (an'thrō-pō-mor''fik), a. 1. Relating to or characterized by anthropomorphism; as, anthropomorphic conceptions of Deity.—2. Resembling man; approaching man in type; anthropoid; as, anthropomorphic apes.

Anthropomorphism (an-thrō'pō-morf''izm), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and morphē, form.] 1. The representation or conception of the Deity under a human form, or with human attributes and affections. Anthropomorphism is founded in the natural inaptitude of the human mind for conceiving spiritual things except through sensuous images, and in its consequent tendency to accept such expressions as those of Scripture when it speaks of the eye, the ear, and the hand of God, of his seeing and hearing, of his remembering and forgetting, of his making man in his own image, &c., in a too literal sense.

> Although Milton was undoubtedly a high Arian in his mature life, he does, in the necessity of poetry, give a greater objectivity to the Father and the Son than he would have justified in argument. He was wise in adopting the strong anthropomorphism of the Hebrew Scriptures at once. Coleridge.

2. The doctrine which attributes to animals mental faculties of the same nature as those of man, though much lower in degree: strictly called biological anthropomorphism, to distinguish it from anthropomorphism proper, or theological anthropomorphism. See extract.

> Descartes . . . deserted the old moderate view which affirmed that between the highest psychical powers of man and brutes there is a certain natural likeness and analogy, and gave rise to the notion that animals are nothing but wonderfully complex machines—an error naturally resulting in the opposite one now so prevalent—the error, namely, that there is a substantial identity between the brute soul and the soul of man—biological anthropomorphism.
> St. George Mivart.

Anthropomorphist (an-thrō'pō-morf''ist), n. An anthropomorphite (which see).

Anthropomorphite (an-thrō'pō-morf''īt), n. One who believes that the Supreme Being exists in human form with human attributes and passions: specifically applied to one of a sect of ancient heretics who held such views.

> Though few profess themselves anthropomorphites, yet we may find many among the ignorant of that opinion. Locke.

Anthropomorphite (an-thrō'pō-morf''īt), a. Relating to anthropomorphism.

Anthropomorphitic, Anthropomorphitical (an-thrō'pō-morf-it''ik, an-thrō'pō-morf-it''ik-al), a. Pertaining to anthropomorphism.

Anthropomorphitism (an-thrō'pō-morf''it-izm), n. The doctrines of anthropomorphites.

Anthropomorphous (an-thrō'pō-morf''us), a. Having the figure of or resemblance to a man; as, an anthropomorphous plant.

Anthropopathical (an-thrō'pō-path''ik-al), a. Subject to human passions.

Anthropopathically (an-thrō'pō-path''ik-al-li), adv. In an anthropopathical manner.

Anthropopathism, Anthropopathy (an-thrō-pop'ath-izm, an-thrō-pop'a-thi), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and pathos, passion.] 1.† The affections or passions of man; sensibility of man.—2. The ascription of human passions to the Supreme Being.

> In its recoil from the gross anthropopathy of the vulgar notions, it falls into the vacuum of absolute apathy. Hare.

Anthropophagi (an-thrō-pof'a-ji), n. pl. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and phagō, to eat.] Man-eaters; cannibals; men that eat human flesh.

> The cannibals that each other eat,
> The anthropophagi. Shak.

Anthropophagical (an-thrō'pō-faj''ik-al), a. Relating to cannibalism.

Anthropophaginian (an-thrō'pō-fa-jin''i-an), n. A cannibal; one who eats human flesh. [Ludicrous.]

He'll speak like an anthropophaginian unto thee. Shak.

Anthropophagite (an-thrō-pof'a-jīt), n. A cannibal.

Anthropophagous (an-thrō-pof'a-gus), a. Feeding on human flesh.

Anthropophagy (an-thrō-pof'a-ji), n. The eating of human flesh, or the practice of eating it. 'The anthropophagy of Diomedes his horse.' Sir T. Browne.

Anthroposcopy (an-thrō-pos'ko-pi), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and skopeō, to view.] The art of discovering or judging of a man's character, passions, and inclinations from the lineaments of his body.

Anthroposophy (an-thrō-pos'o-fi), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and sophia, wisdom.] Knowledge of the nature of man; acquaintance with man's structure and functions, comprehending anatomy and physiology.

Anthropotomical (an'thrō-pō-tom''ik-al), a. Pertaining to anthropotomy, or the dissection of the human body.

Anthropotomist (an-thrō-pot'ō-mist), n. An anatomist of the human body. Owen.

Anthropotomy (an-thrō-pot'o-mi), n. [Gr. anthrōpos, a man, and tomē, a cutting.] The anatomy or dissection of the human body; human anatomy.

The os innominatum is represented throughout life in most reptiles by three distinct bones, answering to the iliac, ischial, and pubic portions in anthropotomy. Owen.

Anthurium (an-thū'ri-um), n. [Gr. anthos, a flower, and oura, a tail.] A genus of South American plants, nat. order Araceæ, growing epiphytically on forest trees. The flowers are arranged on a fleshy spike, rising out of a green or coloured spathe. They are extensively cultivated as ornamental plants in our greenhouses.

Anthus (an'thus), n. [L., a bunting.] A genus of insessorial birds, allied to the genus Alauda (the larks); the pipits or titlarks. There are four species found in the British Islands, the Anthus Richardi (or Richard's pipit), A. pratensis (the meadow pipit or moss-cheeper), A. arboreus (the tree-pipit), and A. aquaticus (the shore-pipit). The meadow-pipit or titling is the species to whose fostering care the young cuckoo is most generally consigned. See PIPIT.

Anthyllis (an-thil'lis), n. [The Greek name of an unascertained plant.] A genus of leguminous plants, to which the kidney-vetch or lady's-fingers (A. Vulneraria) belongs. It is found in dry soils, and was formerly famous for stanching the blood of wounds. See KIDNEY-VETCH.

Anthypnotic (ant-hip-not'ik), a. [Corrupt orthography.] See ANTIHYPNOTIC.

Anthypochondriac (ant-hip'ō-kon''dri-ak). See ANTIHYPOCHONDRIAC.

Anthypophora (ant-hi-pof''o-ra). See ANTIHYPOPHORA.

Anthysteric (ant-his-te'rik). See ANTIHYSTERIC.

Anti- (an'ti). [See ANTE.] A Greek preposition prefixed to many words, almost exclusively of Greek origin, and signifying over against, opposite, adverse, hostile, in place of, equal to, like, in response to, as *anti*clinal, *anti*christian, *anti*graph, *anti*phony.

Antiabolitionist (an'ti-ab-ō-li''shon-ist), n. [Gr. anti, opposed to, and E. abolitionist.] One who opposes abolition; specifically, one who opposed the abolition of slavery in the United States of America.

Anti-acid (an'ti-as'id), n. and a. See ANTACID.

Antiades (an-tī'ad-ēz), n. pl. [Gr., from antios, opposite.] The tonsils.

Antiaditis (an-tī'a-dī''tis), n. [Gr. antiades, the tonsils, and term. itis, denoting inflammation.] Inflammation of the tonsils.

Antiaphrodisiac (an-ti-af'ro-diz''i-ak). See ANTAPHRODISIAC.

Antiar (an'ti-är), n. [Javanese.] The milky juice which exudes from wounds made in the upas-tree, and which is one of the most acrid and virulent vegetable poisons. It acts on the nervous system, paralyzing the heart, and infallibly causes death when introduced even in small quantity into a wound.

Antiarin, Antiarine (an-tī'ar-in), n. ($C_{14}H_{20}O_5+2H_2O$.) The active principle of antiar, the upas-poison. See ANTIAR.

Antiaris (an-ti-ār'is), n. [From antiar.] The genus of Artocarpaceæ to which the famous upas-tree (A. toxicaria) belongs.

Antiaristocrat (an'ti-a-ris''to-krat), n. [Gr. anti, opposed to, and E. aristocrat.] One opposed to aristocracy or aristocrats.

Antiaristocrat, Antiaristocratic (an'ti-a-ris''to-krat, an'ti-a-ris'to-krat''ik), a. Opposed to aristocracy or aristocrats. 'The fire of antiaristocrat eloquence.' Carlyle.

Antiarthritic (an'ti-ār-thrit''ik), a. [See ANTARTHRITIC.] Efficacious against the gout.

Antiasthmatic (an'ti-ast-mat''ik), n. A remedy for the asthma. See ANTASTHMATIC.

Anti-attrition (an'ti-at-tri''shon), n. [Gr. anti, against, and E. attrition (which see).] A general name for any oily compound, as of oil or grease and plumbago, applied to machinery to obviate or lessen the effects of friction. Called also Antifriction Grease.

Antibabylonianism (an'ti-bab'i-lō''ni-an-izm), n. Denunciation of the Church of Rome as being the Whore of Babylon of Scripture.

Our Boanerges with his threats of doom,
And loud-lung'd antibabylonianisms. Tennyson.

Antibacchius (an-ti-bak'ki-us), n. [Gr. anti, opposed to, and bakcheios, a foot of one short and two long syllables. See BACCHIUS.] In pros. a foot of three syllables, the two first long and the last short, as āmbīrē: opposed to the bacchius, in which the first syllable is short, and the two last long.

Antibasilican (an'ti-ba-zil''i-kan), a. [Gr. anti, opposed to, and basilikos, royal.] Opposed to royal state and magnificence.

Antibilious (an-ti-bil'yus), a. [Gr. anti, against, and E. bilious.] Counteractive of bilious complaints.

Antibrachial (an-ti-brā'ki-al), a. [L. antibrachium for antebrachium, the forearm—ante, before, and brachium, the arm.] Pertaining to the forearm. More properly written Antebrachial.

Antiburgher (an-ti-bèrg'èr), n. [Gr. anti, opposed to, and E. Burgher, a seceder who approved of the burgess oath.] A member of one of the two sections into which the Scotch Secession Church was split in 1747, by a controversy on the lawfulness of accepting a clause in the oath required to be taken by burgesses declaratory of 'their profession and allowance of the true religion professed within the realm and authorized by the laws thereof.' The Antiburghers denied that this oath could be taken consistently with the principles of the church, while the Burghers affirmed its compatibility. The result was that the church was rent in two, each section establishing a communion of its own. They coalesced in 1820 into the United Associate Synod.

Antic (an'tik), a. [A form of antique, L. antiquus, ancient. The modern sense of this word is derived from the grotesque figures seen in the antique sculpture of the middle ages. Antimonial (an-ti-mō'ni-al), n. A preparation of antimony; a medicine in which antimony is a principal ingredient.

Antimoniate (an-ti-mō'ni-āt), n. A salt of antimonic acid.

Antimoniated (an-ti-mō'ni-āt-ed), a. Partaking of antimony; mixed or prepared with antimony; as, antimoniated tartar.

Antimonic (an-ti-mon'ik), a. Pertaining to or derived from antimony.—Antimonic acid, an acid composed of two equivalents of antimony and five of oxygen.

Antimonious (an-ti-mō'ni-us), a. Pertaining to, consisting of, or containing antimony.—Antimonious acid, an acid consisting of two equivalents of antimony and four of oxygen.

Antimonite (an'ti-mon-īt), n. 1. A salt of antimonious acid.—2. A mineral, stilbite (which see).

Antimony (an'ti-mo-ni), n. [L. of twelfth century, antimonium, probably from Ar. athmoud, ithmid, which Littré derives from Gr. stimmi, antimony.] Chemical sym. Sb, from L. stibium; sp. gr. 6·7; at. wt. 122·3. A brittle metal of a bluish-white or silver-white colour and plated or scaly texture, occurring in two forms, crystalline and amorphous, sometimes found native or alloyed with other metals. The crystallized trisulphide (Sb_2S_3) is a native mineral called stibnite or antimony-glance. (See STIBNITE.) The metal, or as it was formerly called, the regulus of antimony, is not liable to rust or tarnish when exposed to the air, and this property, combined with its own hardness and that of its compounds, renders it of great service in the useful arts in the construction of alloys, as Britannia metal, type metal, and pewter. In bells it renders the sound more clear; it renders tin more hard, white, and sonorous, and gives to printing types more firmness and smoothness. It is also useful in promoting the fusion of metals, and especially in casting cannon-balls. The salts of antimony are very poisonous. The protoxide is the active base of tartar emetic and James's powder, and is justly regarded as a most valuable remedy in many diseases.—Yellow antimony, a preparation of antimony, of a deep yellow colour, used in enamel and porcelain painting. It is of various tints, and the brilliancy of the brighter hues is not affected by foul air.—Argentine flowers of antimony, the tetroxide of antimony.

Antimony-glance (an'ti-mo-ni-glans), n. Stibnite (which see).

Antimoralist (an-ti-mo'ral-ist), n. [Gr. anti, against, and E. moralist.] An enemy to or opponent of morality. Bp. Warburton.

Antinatural (an-ti-na'tūr-al), a. [Gr. anti, against, and E. natural.] Opposed to what is natural or common-sense; non-natural. 'This happy and antinatural way of thinking.' Martinus Scriblerus.

Antinephritic (an'ti-ne-frit''ik), a. [Gr. anti, and E. nephritic.] In med. counteracting diseases of the kidneys.

Antinomian (an-ti-nō'mi-an), a. [See ANTINOMY.] Opposed to law; pertaining to the Antinomians.

Antinomian (an-ti-nō'mi-an), n. One of a sect who maintain that, under the gospel dispensation, the moral law is of no use or obligation; or who hold doctrines which supersede the necessity of good works and a virtuous life. This sect originated with John Agricola about the year 1538.

Antinomianism (an-ti-nō'mi-an-izm), n. The tenets of the Antinomians.

Antinomist (an-tin'om-ist), n. One who pays no regard to the law or to good works. [Rare.]

Great offenders this way are the libertines and antinomists, who quite cancel the whole law of God under the pretence of Christian liberty. Bp. Sanderson.

Antinomy (an-tin'om-i), n. [Gr. anti, against, and nomos, a law, from nemo, to allot, give out.] 1. The opposition of one law or rule to another law or rule.

Different commentators have deduced from it the very opposite doctrines. In some instances this apparent antinomy is doubtful. De Quincey.

2. Anything, as a law, statement, &c., opposite or contrary.

If God once willed adultery should be sinful, all his omnipotence will not allow him to will the allowance that his holiest people might, by his own antinomy or counter-statute, live unreproved. Milton.

Humility, poverty, meanness, and wretchedness are direct antinomies to the lusts of the flesh. Jer. Taylor.

3. In metaph., according to Kant, that natural contradiction which results from the law of reason, when, passing the limits of experience we seek to know the absolute. Fleming.

Antinous (an-tin'o-us), n. In astron. a part of the constellation Aquila or the Eagle.

Antiochian (an-ti-ok'i-an), a. Pertaining to Antiochus, a contemporary of Cicero, and the founder of a sect of philosophers. This sect was a branch of the Academics, though Antiochus was a Stoic. He attempted to reconcile the doctrines of the different schools, and was the last preceptor of the Platonic school.

Antiochian (an-ti-ok'i-an), a. Of or pertaining to the city of Antioch. — Antiochian epoch, a method of computing time, from the proclamation of liberty granted to the city of Antioch about the time of the battle of Pharsalia (B.C. 48).

Antipapal (an-ti-pā'pal), a. [Gr. anti, against, and E. papal.] Opposed to the pope or to Popery.

He charges strictly his son after him to persevere in that antipapal schism. Milton.

Antipapistical (an'ti-pa-pist''ik-al), a. [Gr. anti, against, and E. papistical.] Antipapal. Jortin.

Antiparallel (an-ti-pa'ral-el), a. [Gr. anti, against, and E. parallel.] Running in a contrary direction. Hammond.

Antiparallel (an-ti-pa'ral-el), n. In geom. one of two or more lines which make equal angles with two other lines, but in a contrary order: thus, supposing A B and A C any two lines, and F C and F E two others cutting them so as to make the angle A B C equal to the angle A E D, and the angle A C B equal to the angle A D E; then B C and D E are antiparallels with respect to A B and A C; also these latter are antiparallels with respect to the two former.

Antiparalytic, Antiparalytical (an'ti-para-lit''ik, an'ti-pa-ra-lit''ik-al), a. [Gr. anti, against, and E. paralytic.] In med. effective against paralysis.

Antiparalytic (an'ti-pa-ra-lit''ik), n. In med. a remedy for paralysis.

Antipart (an'ti-pärt), n. [Gr. anti, against, and E. part.] The counterpart. [Rare.]

Turn now to the reverse of the medal, and there we shall find the antipart of this divine truth. Warburton.

Antipathetic, Antipathetical (an'ti-pa-thet''ik, an'ti-pa-thet''ik-al), a. [See ANTIPATHY.] Having a natural contrariety, or constitutional aversion, to a thing. 'The soil is . . . antipathetical to all venomous creatures.' Howell.

Antipathic (an-ti-path'ik), a. In med. relating to antipathy; opposite; unlike; adverse; as, antipathic humours, or humours opposed to each other. Dunglison.

Sole positive of night!
Antipathist of light. Coleridge.

Antipathous (an-tip'a-thus), a. Having a natural contrariety; adverse.

Still she extends her hand,
As if she saw something antipathoes
Unto her virtuous life. Beau. & Fl.

Antipathy (an-tip'a-thi), n. [Gr. anti, against, and pathos, feeling. See PATHOS.] 1. Natural aversion; instinctive contrariety or opposition in feeling; an aversion felt at the presence, real or ideal, of a particular object; distaste; disgust; repugnance.

No contraries hold more antipathy
Than I and such a knave. Shak.

A man may have an antipathy to particular smells or tastes, a turkey-cock or bull to the colour red, a horse to the smell of raw flesh. Locke.

A habit is generated of thinking that a natural antipathy exists between hope and reason. Is. Taylor.

2. In nat. phil. a contrariety in the properties or affections of matter, as of oil and water, which will not mix. Bacon. [Antipathy is commonly followed by to, sometimes by against, and is opposed to sympathy.] — Antipathy, Hatred, Aversion, Repugnance. Antipathy is a natural and instinctive dislike or feeling of repulsion, and may have either persons, things, or actions as its object; hatred properly applies only to persons, and is provoked by some cause, as ill-usage; aversion, which applies to persons and things, is a strong dislike, as to what shocks or disgusts; repugnance is generally applied to acts. — SYN. Aversion, dislike, disgust, distaste, repugnance, contrariety, opposition.

Antipatriotic (an'ti-pa-tri-ot''ik), a. [Gr. anti, against, and E. patriotic.] Opposed to patriots or patriotism, or one's country.

These antipatriotic prejudices are the abortions of folly impregnated by faction. Johnson.

Anti-periodic (an-ti-pē'ri-od''ik), n. In med. a remedy possessing the property of preventing the return of periodic diseases, as intermittents.

Antiperistaltic (an-ti-pe'ris-tal''tik), a. [Gr. anti, against, and E. peristaltic.] In med. opposed to or checking peristaltic motion.

Antiperistasis (an'ti-pe-ris''ta-sis), n. [Gr. — anti, against, and peristasis, a standing around, from peri, around, and histanai, to stand.] 1. The opposition or antagonism of naturally opposed forces, as light and darkness, heat and cold; specifically, the opposition of a contrary quality, by which the quality opposed acquires strength, or the action by which a body attacked collects force by opposition, or the intension of the activity of one quality by the opposition of another. Thus, sensible heat is excited in quicklime by mixture with water, and cold applied to the human body may increase its heat. — 2. In rhet. a figure by which one grants what an adversary says, but denies his inference.

Antiperistatic (an-ti-pe'ri-stat''ik), a. Pertaining to antiperistasis.

Ape (āp), n. [A. Sax. apa; the word is widely spread; comp. Icel. api, D. aap, Dan. abe, G. affe, O.H.G. affo, Ir. and Gael. apa, W. epa, O. Bohem. op, Mod. Bohem. opec, an ape; an initial guttural has been lost in all these words seen in Gr. kēpos, Skr. kapi, an ape.] 1. A common name of a number of quadrumanous animals inhabiting the Old World (Asia and the Asiatic islands, and Africa), and including a variety of species. The word ape, as well as the terms monkey and baboon, were formerly applied indiscriminately to all quadrumanous mammals; but it is now limited to such as have the teeth of the same number and form as in man, and have no tails nor cheek-pouches. The family includes the chimpanzee, gorilla, orang-outang, &c., and has been divided into three genera, Troglodytes, Simia, and Hylobates. The feet are formed like hands, with four fingers and a thumb, and flat nails.

Long-armed Ape (Hylobates Camboja).

Their arms vary in length, reaching below the knee in the chimpanzee and nearly reaching the ground in the gibbon, when the animal stands erect. Apes are generally fierce and untractable; some, however, are grave and gentle. They inhabit the forests, and live on fruits, leaves, and insects. Some species reach the height of 7 feet, but generally they are from 4 to 5 feet high.—2. One who imitates servilely, in allusion to the imitative habit of the ape; a silly fellow: a term of contempt. 'My lady's ape.' Nabbes.—3. An impertinent, mischievous person; an imp; a term of reproach. 'Boys, apes, braggarts.' Shak.—4. Sometimes used as a term of endearment. 'Poor ape, how thou sweatest!' Shak.—5.† An imitator, in any sense; something that resembles. 'O sleep, thou ape of death.' Shak.—To lead apes in hell, the employment jocularly assigned to old maids in the next world.

I must dance barefoot on your wedding-day,
And for your love to her lead apes in hell.
Shak.

Ape (āp), v.t. pret. & pp. aped; ppr. aping. To imitate servilely; to mimic, as an ape imitates human actions; as, weak persons are always prone to ape their betters.

Curse on the stripling! How he apes his sire!
Ambitiously sententious. Addison.

Apeak (a-pēk'), adv. [Prefix a, on, and peak, a point. See PEAK.] 1. On the point; in a posture to pierce. Johnson.—2. Naut. perpendicular. Apert (a-pèrt'), a. [L. apertus, pp. of aperio, to open.] Open; evident; undisguised. 'Apert confessions.' Fotherby.

The proceedings may be apert, and ingenuous, and candid, and avowable. Donne.

Apertion (a-pèr'shon), n. [L. apertio, from aperio, to open.] 1. The act of opening; the state of being opened. 'Either by ruption or apertion.' Wiseman. [Rare.]—2. An opening; a gap; an aperture; a passage. 'Apertions, under which term I do comprehend doors, windows, staircases—in short, all inlets or outlets.' Sir H. Wotton.

Apertly (a-pèrt'li), adv. Openly.

In all their discourses of him (Richard III.) they never directly nor indirectly, covertly or apertly, insinuate this deformity. Sir G. Buck.

Apertness (a-pèrt'nes), n. Openness. [Rare.]

Apertor (a-pèrt'or), n. [L., from aperio, to open.] In anat. a muscle that raises the upper eyelid.

Aperture (ap'ér-tūr), n. [L. apertura, from aperio, to open.] 1.† The act of opening.—2. An opening; a gap, cleft, or chasm; a passage perforated; a hole through any solid substance. 'An aperture between the mountains.' Gilpin.—3. In geom. the space between two right lines, forming an angle.—4. In optics, the diameter of the exposed part of the object-glass of a telescope or other optical instrument. The aperture of microscopes is often expressed in degrees, called also the angular aperture, which signifies the angular breadth of the pencil of light which the instrument transmits from the object or point viewed; as, a microscope of 100° aperture. Goodrich.—SYN. Opening, hole, orifice, perforation, passage, gap, cleft.

Apery (āp'ér-i), n. 1. A collection of apes; a place where apes are kept.—2. The qualities or tricks of apes; the practice of aping. [Rare.]

It (travel) makes a wise man better and a fool worse. This gains nothing but the gay sights, vices, exotic gestures, and the apery of a country. Feltham.

Apetalæ (a-pet'al-ē), n. pl. [See APETALOUS.] Plants destitute of petals. In the natural system of botany, a division of dicotyledonous plants in which the corolla, and often the calyx as well, are absent. They are called also Incompletæ, and are divided into the Monochlamydeæ, in which the corolla alone is absent, as in the elm, nettle, &c., and the Achlamydeæ, in which calyx and corolla are both absent, as in the willows, oaks, &c.

Apetalous (a-pet'al-us), a. [Gr. a, neg., and petalon, a flower leaf or petal.] In bot. having no petals or corolla; pertaining to the Apetalæ.

Apetalousness (a-pet'al-us-nes), n. The state of being apetalous.

Apex (ā'peks), n. pl. Apices, Apexes (ā'pi-sēz, ā'peks-ēz). [L. apex, pl. apices.] The tip, point, or summit of anything. (a) In bot. the end farthest from the point of attachment, or base of an organ. (b) In geom. the angular point of a cone or conic section; the angular point of a triangle opposite the base.

Aphæresis (a-fē're-sis), n. [Gr. aphairesis, a taking away—apo, from, and haireō, to take.] 1. In gram. the taking of a letter or syllable from the beginning of a word; as, 'mid for amid.—2. In med. the removal of anything noxious.—3. In surg. amputation. Written also Apheresis.

Aphanesite (a-fan'ē-sīt), n. [See APHANISTIC, APHANITE.] A mineral, an arseniate of copper, so named from the difficulty of recognizing it by its crystals.

Aphaniptera (af-an-ip'tèr-a), n. pl. [Gr. aphanēs, indistinct—a, priv., phainō, to appear, and pteron, a wing.] An order of apterous, haustellate insects, coextensive with the family Pulicidæ, having indistinct rudimentary wings. It is composed of the different species of fleas.

Aphanipterous (af-an-ip'tèr-us), a. Destitute of conspicuous wings; pertaining to the Aphaniptera.

Aphanistic (af-an-is'tik), a. [Gr. aphanēs.] In mineral. indistinct.

Aphanite (af'an-īt), n. [Gr. a, priv., and phainō, to appear.] Compact amphibole, a mineral consisting of hornblende, quartz, and felspar so intimately intermixed as to be individually undistinguishable, whence the name.

Aphelion (a-fē'li-on), n. pl. Aphelia (a-fē'li-a). [Gr. apo, from, and hēlios, the sun.] That point of a planet's or comet's orbit which is most distant from the sun: opposed to perihelion.

Aphellan (a-fel'lan), n. The name of a bright star in the constellation Gemini.

Apheresis (a-fē'rē-sis), n. Same as Aphæresis.

Aphides, Aphidæ (af'i-dēz, af'i-dē), n. pl. Plant-lice; a family of homopterous insects, having for its type the genus Aphis. They are all injurious to vegetation, living on the juices of plants, which they suck with their beaks. Almost every species of plants supports a different variety of these insects, which reside on it in immense numbers. They produce gall excrescences on leaves. See APHIS.

Aphidian (a-fid'i-an), n. An insect of the family Aphides.

Aphidian (a-fid'i-an), a. Pertaining to the Aphis or Aphides.

Aphidivorous (af-i-div'ō-rus), a. [Aphis, aphidis, an aphis, and L. voro, to eat.] Eating, devouring, or subsisting on the aphis or plant-louse.

Aphilanthropy (a-fil-an'thrō-pi), n. [Gr. a, neg., and philanthrōpia—phileō, to love, and anthrōpos, man.] 1. Want of love to mankind; want of benevolence.—2. In med. the first stage of melancholy, when solitude is preferred to society.

Aphis (ā'fis), n. pl. Aphides (af'i-dēz). [A term of modern origin, perhaps derived from Gr. aphyssō, to draw or drink up liquids.] A plant-louse; a puceron or vine-fretter; one of the insects of the genus Aphis, family Aphides. The species are very numerous and destructive; the A. rosæ lives on the rose; the A. fabæ on the bean; the A. humuli is injurious to the hop, the A. lanigera or woolly aphis equally so to apple-trees. The aphides are furnished with an inflected beak, and feelers longer than the thorax. In the same species some individuals have four erect wings, and others are entirely without wings. The feet are of the ambulatory kind, and the abdomen usually ends in two horn-like tubes, from which is ejected the substance called honey-dew. The aphides illustrate parthenogenesis; hermaphrodite forms produced from eggs produce viviparous wingless forms, which again produce others like themselves, and thus multiply during Aphides.

Wheat Plant-louse (Aphis granaria).—1, 2. Male, enlarged and natural size. 3, 4, Wingless Female, enlarged and natural size.

summer, one individual giving rise to millions. Winged sexual forms appear late in autumn, the females of which, being impregnated by the males, produce eggs.

Aphlogistic (af-lo-jis'tik), a. [Gr. a, priv., and phlogistos, inflammable.] Flameless; as, an aphlogistic lamp, in which the wick, usually of platinum wire, is kept constantly red hot by the slow combustion of alcohol, heated by the wire itself.

Aphnology (af-nol'o-ji), n. [Gr. aphnos, wealth, and logos, a discourse.] The science of wealth; a treatise on the science of wealth; plutology.

The title ought to have been Aphnology. Aphnos, or aphence, expresses wealth in the largest sense of general abundance and well-being. Sir J. Herschel.

Aphonia, Aphony (a-fō'ni-a, af'ō-ni), n. [Gr. a, priv., and phōnē, voice.] A loss of voice; dumbness; speechlessness.

Aphonous (af'ō-nus), a. [See APHONIA.] Destitute of voice.

Aphorism (af'or-izm), n. [Gr. aphorismos, a short pithy sentence, from aphorizō, to mark out, to define—apo, from, and horos, a boundary.] A precept or principle expressed in a few words; a detached sentence containing some important truth; a maxim; as, the aphorisms of Hippocrates, or of the civil law.

The three commentators on Hippocrates have given the same definition of an aphorism, namely, 'a succinct saying, comprehending a complete statement.' The first aphorism of Hippocrates is, 'Life is short, but art is long.' Fleming.

—Aphorism, Axiom, Maxim, Apophthegm, Adage, Proverb, Byword, Saw, all concur in expressing a short pregnant saying, generally in one sentence. Aphorism, a truth pointedly set forth, relating rather to speculative principles, ethics, or science than to practical matters. It is the brief statement of a doctrine. 'Moderation is the silken string running through the pearl-chain of all virtues;' 'Maladies are cured by nature, not by remedies,' are aphorisms. Axiom, a statement claiming to be considered as a self-evident truth relating to pure science, frequently assumed as a basis for argument or demonstration; as, 'A straight line is the shortest distance between any two points;' 'Things which are equal to the same thing are equal to one another.' Maxim, a truth, though not so definite as the axiom, yet equally acceptable to the mind, and referring rather to practical than to abstract truth, as to morals, policy, conduct, and the like. It suggests a lesson more pointedly and directly than an aphorism, and is the basis of a rule for conduct. It differs from a precept in that the latter is a direct injunction, whereas a maxim is the mere statement of a truth from which a precept may be deduced. 'Honesty is the best policy;' 'The hand of the diligent maketh rich,' are maxims. Apophthegm is in common matters what the aphorism is in higher. It is essentially a terse saying that makes on us a vivid impression. Thus, 'God helps them that help themselves;'

He that fights and runs away
May fight again another day, are apophthegms. Adage and proverb are habitual sayings embodying the common sense of mankind on ordinary subjects. The adage, however, refers generally to a specific truth, and is conveyed directly. 'Necessity has no law;' 'Adversity is the best teacher,' or, as the Greeks put it, 'Whatever hurts us instructs us,' are adages. The proverb is usually allegorical, conveying a and prophecy; the patron of physicians, shepherds, and founders of cities. He invented the harp or lyre, and was the father of Æsculapius.—Apollo Belvidere, a celebrated statue of Apollo in the Belvidere gallery of the Vatican palace at Rome, esteemed one of the noblest representations of the human frame, and one of the finest pieces of sculpture extant. It was discovered among the ruins of ancient Antium at the end of the 15th century.

Apollyon (a-pol'yon), n. [Gr. apollyōn, destroying, ppr. of apollyō, to destroy utterly—apo, from, or utterly, and ollymi, to destroy.] The destroyer; a name used (Rev. ix. 11) for the angel of the bottomless pit, answering to the Hebrew Abaddon.

Apologetic, Apologetical (a-pol'o-jet"ik, a-pol'o-jet"ik-al), a. [Gr. apologētikos, from apologeomai, to speak in defence of—apo, from, and logos, speech.] Of or pertaining to or containing apology; defending by words or arguments; said or written in defence, or by way of apology; excusing; as, an apologetic essay.

Apologetically (a-pol'o-jet"ik-al-li), adv. In an apologetic manner; by way of apology or excuse.

Apologetics (a-pol'o-jet"iks), n. [See APOLOGETIC.] That branch of theology which has for its object a systematic arrangement of those external and internal evidences of Christianity, or of the Holy Scriptures, by which Christians are enabled scientifically to justify and defend the peculiarities of their faith, and to answer its opponents.

Apologist (a-pol'o-jist), n. One who makes an apology; one who speaks or writes in defence of another.

Apologize (a-pol'o-jīz), v.i. pret. & pp. apologized; ppr. apologizing. To make an apology; to write or speak in favour, or to make excuse; to plead in defence: followed by for; as, my correspondent apologized for not answering my letter.

Apologize † (a-pol'o-jīz), v.t. To make or write an apology for; to defend.

> Therefore the Christians, in his time, . . . were apologized by Plinie the second. Dr. G. Benson.

Apologizer (a-pol'o-jīz-ėr), n. One who makes an apology or defends.

Apologue (ap'o-log), n. [Gr. apologos, an apologue, a fable—apo, from, and logos, discourse.] A moral fable; an allegory; a story or relation of fictitious events intended to convey useful truths. An apologue differs from a parable in this: the parable is drawn from events which pass among mankind, and is therefore supported by probability; an apologue may be founded on supposed actions of brutes or inanimate things, and therefore does not require to be supported by probability. Æsop's fables are good examples of apologues.

Apologuer † (ap'o-log-ėr), n. One who writes apologues; a fabler. Burton.

Apology (a-pol'o-ji), n. [Gr. apologia, a defence—apo, away from, and logos, a discourse.] 1. Something said or written in defence or justification of what appears to others wrong or unjustifiable, or of what may be liable to disapprobation; defence; justification; vindication.

> I shall neither trouble the reader nor myself with any apology for publishing these sermons. Tillotson.
> Bishop Watson's 'Apology for the Bible' is a good book with a bad title. R. Hall.

2. An acknowledgment, usually accompanied by an expression of regret, for some improper remark or act; as, he made a handsome apology for his rudeness.—3. Something that only serves a purpose in the lack of better; a temporary substitute; a makeshift.

> He wears a wisp of black silk round his neck, without any stiffener, as an apology for a neckerchief. Dickens.

Apomecometer (ap'o-mē-kom"et-ėr), n. [See APOMECOMETRY.] An instrument used in measuring heights, constructed in accordance with the principles which govern the sextant.

Apomecometry (ap'o-mē-kom"et-ri), n. [Gr. apo, away, mēkos, distance, and metron, measure.] The art of measuring things distant.

Aponeurography (ap'o-nū-rog"ra-fi), n. A description of aponeuroses.

Aponeurology (ap'o-nū-rol"o-ji), n. 1. The anatomy of aponeuroses.—2. A treatise on aponeuroses.

Aponeurosis (ap'o-nū-rō"sis), n. pl. Aponeuroses (ap'o-nū-rō"sēz). [Gr. aponeurōsis—apo, from, and neuron, a nerve, because formerly supposed to be an expansion of a nerve or nerves. See NERVE.] A white, shining, and very resisting membrane, composed of interlaced fibres. Some are continuous with muscular fibre, and differ from tendons, of which they are the expansions, only in being flat; others surround the voluntary muscles and keep them in their places; others protect large arteries.

Aponeurotic (ap'o-nū-rot"ik), a. Relating to the aponeuroses.

Aponeurotomy (ap'o-nū-rot"o-mi), n. [Gr. apo, neuron, a nerve, and tomē, a cutting.] Dissection of the aponeuroses.

Apopemptic (ap-o-pemp'tik), a. [Gr. apopemptikos, valedictory—apo, from, and pempō, to send.] Sung or addressed to a stranger on his departure from a place to his own country; valedictory.

Apopemptic (ap-o-pemp'tik), n. A song or hymn addressed to a stranger on his departure to his own country.

Apopetalous (ap-o-pet'al-us), a. [Gr. apo, away, and E. petal (which see).] In bot. having the leaves of the perianth-whorl not coherent but free; eleutheropetalous. Sachs.

Apophasis (a-pof'a-sis), n. [Gr. apo, from, and phasis, form of speech.] In rhet. a figure of speech by which the speaker seems to waive what he would plainly insinuate; as, 'I will not mention another argument, which, however, if I should you could not refute.'

Apophlegmatic (ap'o-fleg-mat"ik), a. [Gr. apo, from, and phlegma, phlegm. See PHLEGMATIC.] In med. having the quality of exciting discharges of phlegm or mucus from the mouth or nostrils.

Apophlegmatism (ap-o-fleg'mat-izm), n. 1. Something which excites discharges of phlegm.—2. The action of apophlegmatic medicines.

Apophthegm (ap'o-them), n. [Gr. apo, from, and phthegma, word.] A short, pithy, and instructive saying; a terse remark, conveying some important truth; a sententious precept or maxim. Written also Apothegm.

> Of Blackmore's attainments in the ancient tongues it may be sufficient to say that . . . he has confounded an aphorism with an apophthegm. Macaulay.

—Aphorism, Axiom, Maxim, Apophthegm, Adage, Proverb, Byword, Saw. See under APHORISM.

Apophthegmatic, Apophthegmatical (ap'o-theg-mat"ik, ap'o-theg-mat"i-kal), a. 1. Pertaining to or having the character of an apophthegm; containing an apophthegm or apophthegms; sententious.—2. Given to the use of apophthegms. Written also Apothegmatic, Apothegmatical.

Apophthegmatist (ap-o-theg'mat-ist), n. A collector or maker of apophthegms. Martinus Scriblerus.

Apophthegmatize (ap-o-theg'mat-iz), v.i. To utter apophthegms, or short instructive sentences.

Apophyge (a-pof'i-je), n. [Gr. apo, from, and phygē, flight.] In arch. the part of a column where it springs out of its base, usually moulded into a concave sweep or cavetto. It is sometimes called the scape or spring of the column.

Apophyllite (a-pof'i-līt or ap-o-fil'līt), n. [Gr. apo, from, and phyllon, a leaf: so called because of its tendency to exfoliate.] A mineral of the zeolite family, occurring in laminated masses or in regular prismatic crystals, having a strong and peculiar pearly lustre. Its structure is foliated, and when a fragment is forcibly rubbed against a hard body it separates into thin laminæ like selenite. It exfoliates also under the blowpipe. From its peculiar lustre it is sometimes called Ichthyophthalmite, that is, fish-eye stone. It is a hydrated silicate of lime and potash, and also contains fluorine.

Apophyllous (a-pof'il-us or ap-o-fil'lus), a. [Gr. apo, away, and phyllon, a leaf.] In bot. having a single perianth-whorl with free leaves; eleutherophyllous. Sachs.

Apophysis (a-pof'i-sis), n. pl. Apophyses (a-pof'i-sēz). [Gr.—apo, from, and physis, growth.] 1. In anat. a process or regular prominence or swelling; a prominent part of a bone, forming a continuous part of the body of the bone, in distinction from epiphysis (which see).—2. In bot. a swelling under the base of the theca or spore-case of some mosses, as in Splachnum.

Apoplectic, Apoplectical (ap-o-plek'tik, ap-o-plek'tik-al), a. [See APOPLEXY.] 1. Pertaining to or consisting in apoplexy; as, an apoplectic fit.—2. Predisposed to apoplexy; as, an apoplectic habit of body.—3. Serving to cure apoplexy.

Apoplectic (ap-o-plek'tik), n. A person affected with apoplexy.

Apoplex (ap'o-pleks), n. Apoplexy. 'Repletions, apoplex, intestate death.' Dryden. [Poetical.]

Apoplexed † (ap'o-plekst), a. Affected with apoplexy or paralysis. 'Sure that sense is apoplexed.' Shak.

Apoplexious (ap-o-plek'shus), a. Consisting in or having the character of apoplexy. 'Apoplexious and other congenerous diseases.' Arbuthnot.

Apoplexy (ap'o-plek-si), n. [Gr. apoplēxia, a being disabled in body or mind by a stroke, apoplexy—apo, from, and plēssō, to strike.] Abolition or sudden diminution of sensation and voluntary motion, from suspension of the functions of the cerebrum, resulting from congestion or rupture of the blood-vessels of the brain. The premonitory symptoms of this dangerous disease are drowsiness, giddiness, dulness of hearing, frequent yawning, disordered vision, noise in the ears, vertigo, &c. It is accompanied with speechlessness, stertorous breathing, heavy sleep, and slow pulse. It is most frequent between the ages of fifty and seventy. Apoplexy is now used by many writers to mean any sudden engorgement or effusion of blood into an organ or tissue; hence we speak of cerebral, pulmonary, renal, cutaneous, &c., apoplexy. Sunstroke is sometimes termed heat apoplexy.

Aporia (a-pō'ri-a), n. [Gr. aporia, difficulty, doubt, from aporos, without passage—a, priv., and poros, way or passage.] 1. In rhet. a real or professed doubting or being at a loss where to begin or what to say on account of the variety of matter.—2. In med. febrile anxiety; uneasiness; restlessness, from obstructed perspiration or the stoppage of any natural secretion.

Aporon, Aporime (ap'o-ron, ap'o-rim), n. [See APORIA.] A problem difficult to be resolved.

Aporosa (ap-o-rō'sa), n. pl. [Gr. aporos, without passage.] A group of corals of the sclerodermic section, having the 'corallum' or calcareous cup solid, and not perforated with minute apertures.

Aporose (ap-o-rōs), a. Not porous; more specifically, belonging to those corals called Aporosa.

Aporrhais (ap-or-rā'is), n. [Gr. aporrhoē, to flow away: name suggested by its spout-like form.] A genus of marine gasteropod molluscs, family Cerithiadæ, containing the well-known pelican's foot or spout-shell (A. pes-pelicani).

Aposepalous (ap-o-sep'al-us), a. [Gr. apo, away, and E. sepal (which see).] Same as Apopetalous.

Aposepidin (ap-o-sep'i-din), n. [Gr. apo, away, and sēpedōn, putrefaction.] Leucin (which see).

Aposiopesis (ap'o-si-ō-pē"sis), n. [Gr. aposiōpēsis—apo, from, and siōpaō, to be silent.] In rhet. reticency or suppression, as when a speaker, for some cause, as fear, sorrow, anger, or mere effect, suddenly breaks off his discourse before it is ended; or speaks of a thing when he makes a show as if he would say nothing on the subject; or aggravates what he pretends to conceal by uttering a part and leaving the remainder to be understood; as, his character is such—but it is better I should not speak of that.

Apostasis (a-pos'ta-sis), n. [Gr. See APOSTASY.] 1. In old med. the termination or crisis of a disease by some secretion or critical discharge, in opposition to metastasis, or the termination by transfer to some other part. Hence—2. An aposteme, impostlume, or abscess.—3. The throwing off or separation of exfoliated or fractured bones.

Apostasy (a-pos'ta-si), n. [Gr. apostasia, a standing away from, a defection—apo, from, and root sta, to stand.] 1. An abandonment of what one has professed; a total desertion or departure from one's faith, principles, or party.

> The canon law defines apostasy to be a wilful departure from that . . . faith which any person has professed himself to hold. Ayliffe.

2. In med. apostasis (which see).

Apostata † (a-pos'ta-ta), n. An apostate. Massinger.

Apostate (a-pos'tāt), n. [Gr. apostatēs. See APOSTASY.] 1. One who has forsaken the church, sect, or profession to which he before adhered: in its original sense applied to one who has abandoned his religion, but correctly applied also to one who abandons a political or other party.—2. In the R. Cath. Ch. one who, without a legal dispensation, forsakes a religious order of which he has made profession.—Convert, Proselyte, Apostate, Pervert. See under CONVERT.

Apostate (a-pos'tāt), a. False; traitorous. 'The apostate lords.' Macaulay.

Apostate† (a-pos'tāt), v.i. To apostatize.

Had Peter been truly inspired by God . . . he would not have apostated from his purpose. Fuller.

Apostatical (ap-o-stat'ik-al), a. After the manner of an apostate. 'An heretical and apostaticall church.' Bp. Hall.

Apostatize (a-pos'ta-tīz), v.i. pret. & pp. apostatized; ppr. apostatizing. To abandon one's profession or church; to forsake principles or faith which one has professed, or the party to which one has been attached.

He apostatized from his old faith in facts, took to believing in semblances. Carlyle.

Apostaxis (ap-o-stak'sis), n. [Gr. apo, away, from, and stazō, to drop.] 1. In old med. the dropping of any fluid, as of blood from the nose.—2. In bot. an abnormal discharge of the juices of plants, as the gumming of the plum.

Apostemate (a-pos'tē-māt), v.i. To form into an abscess; to swell and fill with pus.

Apostemation (a-pos'tē-mā"shon), n. The formation of an aposteme; the process of gathering into an abscess. Written corruptly Imposthumation.

Apostematous (ap-os-tem'at-us), a. Pertaining to an abscess; partaking of the nature of an aposteme.

Aposteme (ap'os-tēm), n. [Gr. apostēma, distance, a large deep-seated ulcer—apo, from, and histēmi, to stand.] An abscess; a swelling filled with purulent matter. Written also corruptly Imposthume.

A posteriori (a pos-tē'ri-ō"ri). [L. posterior, after.] A phrase denoting a mode of reasoning founded on observation of effects, consequences, or facts, whereby we reach the causes; inductive: opposed to a priori.

Aposthume† (ap'os-tūm), n. Same as Aposteme.

Apostil, Apostill (a-pos'til), n. [Fr. apostille. See POSTIL.] A marginal note or reference; a postscript. Motley.

Apostle (a-pos'l), n. [Gr. apostolos, one sent forth, a messenger, in New Testament Gr. an apostle—apo, forth, and stellō, to send.] 1. A person deputed to execute some important business; but specifically, a disciple of Christ commissioned to preach the gospel. Twelve persons were selected by Christ for this purpose; and Judas, one of the number, proving an apostate, his place was supplied by Matthias, Acts i. 26. The title of apostle is applied to Christ himself, Heb. iii. 1. In the primitive ages of the church other ministers were called apostles, Rom. xvi. 7. This title was also given to persons who first planted the Christian faith in different parts of the world. Thus Dionysius of Corinth is called the apostle of France; and various missionaries have been called apostles.—2. In law, a brief statement of a case sent by a court whence an appeal has been taken to a superior court: a sense which belonged to the L. apostolus among the Roman jurists.—3. In the Greek Ch. a book containing the epistles of St. Paul, printed in the order in which they are to be read in churches throughout the year.—4. Naut. a knight-head or bollard-timber where hawsers and heavy ropes are belayed.—Apostles' creed, a confession of faith supposed to have been drawn up by the apostles. This creed as it now stands in the liturgy of the English Church is to be found in the works of St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, in the fourth century.—Apostles' gems. In the middle ages the apostles were often symbolized under the names of various gems; thus, St. Peter was symbolized by jasper, St. Andrew by sapphire, St. John by emerald, St. Matthew by chrysolite, &c.—Apostles' ointment, an ointment formerly used, owing its virtues greatly to the fact that it was composed of twelve ingredients, resins, gums, wax, oil, vinegar, verdigris, &c., thus corresponding in number to the apostles.—Apostles' spoon, a spoon of silver gilt, with a handle terminating in the figure of an apostle, one or more of which formed the usual present of sponsors to the infant at christenings. Thus when Cranmer (Shak. Hen. VIII.) declines being sponsor to the princess, the king replies, 'Come, my lord, you would save your spoons.'

Apostleship (a-pos'l-ship), n. The office or dignity of an apostle.

Apostle-spoon (a-pos'l-spön), n. Same as Apostles' spoon (which see under APOSTLE). B. Jonson.

Apostolate (a-pos'tol-āt), n. 1. The dignity or office of an apostle; a mission. 'When Judas had miscarried, and lost his apostolate.' Jer. Taylor. Specifically—2. The dignity or office of the pope: the holder of the apostolic see. See under APOSTOLIC.

Apostolic, Apostolical (ap-os-tol'ik, ap-os-tol'ik-al), a. 1. Pertaining or relating to or characteristic of an apostle, or more especially of the twelve apostles; as, the apostolic age. 2. According to the doctrines of the apostles; delivered or taught by the apostles; as, apostolic faith or practice.—Apostolic Constitutions and Canons, a collection of regulations attributed to the apostles, but generally supposed to be spurious. They appeared in the fourth century; are divided into eight books, and consist of rules and precepts relating to the duty of Christians, and particularly to the ceremonies and discipline of the church.—Apostolic fathers, the Christian writers who during any part of their lives were contemporary with the apostles. There are five—Clement, Barnabas, Hermas, Ignatius, Polycarp.—Apostolic king, a title granted by the pope to the kings of Hungary, first conferred on St. Stephen the founder of the royal line of Hungary, on account of what he accomplished in the spread of Christianity.—Apostolic see, the see of the popes or bishops of Rome: so called because the popes profess themselves the successors of Peter, its founder.—Apostolic succession, the uninterrupted succession of bishops, and, through them, of priests and deacons (these three orders of ministers being called the apostolical orders), in the church by regular ordination from the first apostles down to the present day. All Episcopal churches hold theoretically, and the Roman Catholic Church and many members of the English Church strictly, that such succession is essential to the officiating priest, in order that grace may be communicated through his administrations.

But a new race of divines was already rising in the Church of England. In their view the episcopal office was essential to the welfare of a Christian society, and to the efficacy of the most solemn ordinances of religion. To that office belonged certain high and sacred privileges which no human power could give or take away. A church might as well be without the doctrine of the Trinity, or the doctrine of the incarnation, as without the apostolical orders; and the Church of Rome, which, in the midst of all her corruptions, had retained the apostolical orders, was nearer to primitive purity than those reformed societies which had rashly set up, in opposition to the divine model, a system invented by men. Macaulay.

—Apostolical church, the church in the time of the apostles, constituted according to their design; specifically, a name given to the four churches of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem.

Apostolic (ap-os-tol'ik), n. 1. A member of one of certain sects which arose at various times: so called from their pretending to imitate the practice of the apostles, abstaining from marriage, from wine, flesh, pecuniary reward, &c., and wandering about clothed in white, with long beards and bare heads.—2. A priest who obtained a letter from the pope to a vacant benefice.—3. An archbishop.

Apothecary (a-poth'e-ka-ri), n. [L. L. apothecarius, the keeper of a shop, store, or magazine, from Gr. apothēkē, a repository—apo, away, and thēkē, a chest, from tithēmi, to place. The Gr. apothēkē, we may mention, appears in It. as bottega, in Fr. as boutique, a shop, in Sp. as bodega, a wine cellar.] One who practises pharmacy; a skilled person who prepares drugs for medicinal uses, and keeps them for sale. Formerly the apothecary merely compounded and dispensed the prescriptions of the physician and surgeon. In England and Ireland the term is now specifically applied to an inferior sort of practitioners, who are licensed to practise medicine and at the same time deal in drugs. The apothecary cannot charge for both advice and medicine, but must make his election and charge for either singly. In Scotland the apothecary, as such, is only a dispenser of drugs.—Apothecaries' Company, one of the worshipful companies of London incorporated by royal charter in 1606. It is empowered to grant a qualification to practise medicine.—Apothecaries' Hall, the hall of the corporation of apothecaries of London where genuine medicines are prepared and sold under their direction.—Apothecaries' weight, the weight employed in dispensing drugs, differing only in its subdivisions from troy weight.

Apothecium (ap-o-thē'si-um), n. pl. Apothecia (ap-o-thē'si-a). [Gr. apo, away, and thēkē, a case to put anything in, a capsule. See APOTHECARY.] In bot. the receptacle of lichens, consisting of the spore-cases or asci, and of the paraphyses or barren threads. It is either expanded in the form of a round horny shield, as in the gymnocarpous lichens, or is contained in a cavity having an orifice through which the spores escape, as in the angiocarpous lichens.

Apothegm (ap'o-them), n. Same as Apophthegm.

Apothegmatic, Apothegmatical (ap'o-theg-mat"ik, ap'o-theg-mat"ik-al), a. Same as Apophthegmatic, Apophthegmatical. 'A witty apothegmatical comparison.' T. Warton.

Apotheosis (ap'o-thē-ō"sis or ap-o-thē'ō-sis), n. [Gr. apotheōsis—apo, away, and Theos, God.] Deification; consecration; the act of placing a prince or other distinguished person among the heathen deities. This honour was often bestowed on illustrious men in Rome.

A regular custom was introduced, that on the decease of every emperor who had neither lived nor died like a tyrant, the senate, by a solemn decree, should place him in the number of the gods; and the ceremonies of his apotheosis were blended with those of his funeral. Gibbon.

Apotheosize (ap'o-thē-ō"sīz or ap-o-thē'ō-sīz), v.t. To consecrate or exalt to the dignity of a deity; to deify.

Apothesis (a-poth'e-sis), n. [Gr. apothesis, a putting back or away—apo, away, and tithēmi, to place.] 1.† In surg. the reduction of a dislocated bone.—2. In arch. a place on the south side of the chancel in the primitive churches, furnished with shelves for books, vestments, &c.

Apotome, Apotomy (a-pot'o-mi), n. [Gr. apotomē, a cutting away—apo, from, off, and temnō, to cut.] 1. In math. the difference between two incommensurable quantities, or which are commensurable only in power. Such is the difference between 1 and $\sqrt{2}$, or the difference between the side of a square and its diagonal.—2. In music, a major semitone.

Apotrepsis (ap-o-trep'sis), n. [Gr., a turning away, aversion—apo, from, and trepō, to turn.] In med. the resolution of a suppurating tumour.

Appraise (ap-prāz'), v.t. pret. & pp. appraised; ppr. appraising. [O.Fr. appreiser; L. appretiare, to set a price on—ad, to, and pretium, a price. See PRAISE, PRICE, APPRECIATE.] 1. To value; to set a price upon; to estimate the value of. [It is generally used for the act of valuing by men appointed for the purpose, under direction of law or by agreement of parties; as, to appraise the goods and estate of a deceased person, or goods taken under a distress for rent. See note under APPRAISER.]—2. To estimate generally.

The sickly babe, . . .
Whom Enoch took, and handled all his limbs,
Appraised his weight, and fondled father-like.
Tennyson.

3. To praise. [Rare.]

Appraisement (ap-prāz'ment), n. The act of setting a value under some authority or appointment; also, the rate at which a thing is valued; the value fixed, or valuation. In England, when goods have been taken under a distress for rent, it is necessary, in order to enable the landlord to sell them, that they should be previously appraised or valued by two appraisers, who are sworn to appraise the goods truly, according to the best of their understanding. See note under next article.

Appraiser (ap-prāz'ėr), n. One who appraises; specifically, a person licensed and sworn to estimate and fix the value of goods and estate.

Note.—Appraise, appraiser, appraisement, are now almost uniformly used, instead of apprize, apprizer, apprizement, although the latter were formerly used by good English authors, as Lord Bacon, Bishop Hall, &c., and are still frequently used in the United States, where the former words are often pronounced like the latter.

Apprecation† (ap-prē-kā'shon), n. [L. apprecor, apprecatus, to pray to—ad, and precor, to pray.] Prayer. 'Fervent apprecations.' Bp. Hall.

Appredicate (ap-pre'di-kāt), n. [Ap for L. ad, to, and E. predicate.] An addition to the predicate; the copula in a proposition.

By Aristotle the predicate includes the copula, and from a hint by him the latter has by subsequent Greek logicians been styled the appredicate. Sir W. Hamilton.

Apprehend (ap-prē-hend'), v.t. [L. apprehendo—ad, and prehendo, to take or seize, præ, before, and hendo (not used), to seize.] 1.† To take or seize; to take or lay hold of.

There is nothing but hath a double handle, or at least, we have two hands to apprehend it. Jer. Taylor.

2.† To occupy or take possession of; to take for one's self.—3. To take into custody; to take or arrest by legal process, or with a view to trial; as, to apprehend a thief.—4. To take or lay hold of by the mind; to become cognizant of; to understand; to recognize; to discern or perceive; to become conscious of.

Full to the utmost measure of what bliss
Human desires can seek or apprehend. Milton.

He seems to hear a heavenly friend,
And thro' thick veils to apprehend
A labour working to an end. Tennyson.

5. To conceive or regard as such or such; to view or consider; to look upon as. Gladstone.—6. To regard or look forward to with some dread; to anticipate with doubts; to entertain suspicion or fear of: often said of a future evil; as, we apprehend calamities from a feeble or wicked administration.

Apprehend, Comprehend. See following extract.

We apprehend many truths which we do not comprehend. The great mystery, for instance, of the Holy Trinity—we lay hold upon it (ad prehendo), we hang upon it, our souls live by it; but we do not take it all in, we do not comprehend it. It belongs to the idea of God that he may be apprehended though not comprehended by his reasonable creatures; he has made them to know him, though not to know him all, to apprehend though not to comprehend him. Trench.

SYN. To catch, seize, arrest, detain, capture, conceive, understand, believe, fear, dread.

Apprehend (ap-prē-hend'), v.i. 1. To seize with the mind; to form a conception; to conceive; to think; to suppose; to imagine. 'You apprehend passing shrewdly.' Shak. 2. To think; to believe or be of opinion, but without positive certainty: used as a modest way of introducing an opinion; as, all this is true, but we apprehend it is not to the purpose.—3. To be apprehensive; to be in fear of a future evil. 'It is worse to apprehend than to suffer.' Rowe.

Apprehender (ap-prē-hend'ėr), n. One who apprehends.

Apprehensible (ap-prē-hen'si-bl), a. Capable of being apprehended or conceived.

Apprehension (ap-prē-hen'shon), n. 1. Lit. the act of seizing or taking hold of; as, the hand is the organ of apprehension.—2. The act of arresting or seizing by legal process; as, the felon, after his apprehension, escaped. 3. The mere contemplation of things without affirming, denying, or passing any judgment; the operation of the mind in contemplating ideas, without comparing them with others or referring them to external objects; simple intellection; the simple reception of a notion, without necessarily full comprehension of it, as of the Trinity: specifically called by logicians simple apprehension.—4. Opinion; conception; sentiments; belief; as, in our apprehension the facts prove the issue.

To be false, and to be thought false, is all one in respect of men who act, not according to truth, but apprehension. South.

5. The faculty by which new ideas are conceived; power of perceiving and understanding; intellect. 'In apprehension how like a god.' Shak.—6. Distrust or fear at the prospect of future evil, accompanied with uneasiness of mind.

The sense of death is most in apprehension. Shak.
Claudius was in no small apprehension for his own life. Addison.

—Incomplex apprehension regards one object or several, without any relation being perceived between them, as a man, a horse, cards; complex apprehension is of several objects with such a relation, as of a man on horseback, a pack of cards.—Apprehension, Comprehension. Apprehension is properly simply cognizance or consciousness of the existence of an object, and is analogous to perception by the senses. It implies, therefore, only partial knowledge. Comprehension, in its fullest sense, implies a knowledge of all the properties and relations of its object, and implies, therefore, full knowledge. See extract from Abp. Trench under the verb.

Apprehensive (ap-prē-hen'siv), a. 1.† Ready to catch or seize; desirous to lay hold of.

Approbate (ap'prō-bāt), a. 1.† Approved. Sir T. Elyot.—2. In Scots law, accepted. See under the verb.

Approbate (ap'prō-bāt), v.t. pret. & pp. approbated; ppr. approbating. [L. approbo, approbatum, to approve—the same word as approve, except that the latter has come to us through the French, while this word has been taken direct from the Latin.] To express approbation of; to manifest a liking for or degree of satisfaction in; to express approbation of officially, as of one's fitness for a public trust; to approve.

The cause of this battle every man did allow and approbate. Hall.
Mr. Hutchinson approbated the choice. J. Eliot.

—Approbate and reprobate, in Scots law, a phrase employed when a person takes advantage of one part of a deed but rejects the rest; as, for example, where a disposition on death-bed revokes a previous liege poustie conveyance to the prejudice of the heir-at-law, but still gives the estate past the heir. The heir who abides by the deed in so far as it revokes the liege poustie deed to his prejudice, while he challenges it on the head of death-bed, in so far as it defeats his interest in the estate, is said to approbate and reprobate the deed But this, as a rule, is contrary to law. In America this word is used pretty frequently in the technical sense of to license; as, to approbate a person to preach; to approbate a man to keep a public-house, &c.

Approbation (ap-prō-bā'shon), n. [L. approbatio. See APPROBATE.] 1. The act of approving; that state or disposition of the mind in which we assent to the propriety of a thing with some degree of pleasure or satisfaction; approval. 'The silent approbation of one's own breast.' Melmoth.

With his great presence, and approof of it. Beaumont.

Approperate † (ap-prop'ėr-āt), v.t. [L. appropero, approperatum—ad, and propero, to hasten, from properus, quick.] To hasten.

Appropinquate † (ap-prō-ping'kwāt), v.i. [L. appropinquo, appropinquatum—ad, and propinquo, to bring near, from propinquus, near.] To draw near.

Appropinquation †(ap'prō-ping-kwā''shon), n. A drawing nigh. 'There are many ways of our appropinquation to God.' Bp. Hall.

Appropinque † (ap-prō-pingk'), v.t. To approach.

The clotted blood within my hose . . .
With mortal crisis doth portend
My days to appropinque an end. Hudibras.

Appropre † (ap-prō'pėr), v.t. To appropriate. Fuller.

Appropriable (ap-prō'pri-a-bl), a. Capable of being appropriated, set apart, sequestered, or assigned exclusively to a particular use.

Appropriament † (ap-prō'pri-a-ment), n. Anything properly or peculiarly one's own; a peculiar quality or qualification.

If you can neglect
Your own appropriaments, but praising that
In others wherein you excel yourself,
You shall be much beloved here. Ford.

Appropriate (ap-prō'pri-āt), v.t. pret. & pp. appropriated; ppr. appropriating. [L. approprio, appropriatum, to make one's own—ad, to, proprius, one's own, proper. See PROPER, PROPRIETY.] 1. To claim or take to one's self in exclusion of others; to claim or use as by an exclusive right; as, let no man appropriate the use of a common benefit. 'To themselves appropriating the Spirit of God.' Milton.—2. To set apart for or assign to a particular purpose or use in exclusion of all other purposes or uses; as, a spot of ground is appropriated for a garden.

The profits of that establishment had been appropriated by Parliament to the Duke of York. Macaulay.

3. In eccles. law, to annex, as a benefice, to a spiritual corporation, for its perpetual use.

Appropriate (ap-prō'pri-āt), a. Set apart for a particular use or person; hence, belonging peculiarly; peculiar; suitable; fit; proper; as, religious worship is an appropriate duty to the Creator.

It might be thought to be rather a matter of dignity than any matter of diffidence appropriate to his own case. Bacon.

It is not at all times easy to find words appropriate to express our ideas. Locke.

Appropriate (ap-prō'pri-āt), n. Peculiar characteristic; proper function; property.

The Bible's appropriate being . . . to enlighten the eyes and make wise the simple. Boyle.

Appropriately (ap-prō'pri-āt-li), adv. In an appropriate or proper manner.

Appropriateness (ap-prō'pri-āt-nes), n. The quality of being appropriate or peculiarly suitable.

Appropriation (ap-prō'pri-ā''shon), n. 1. The act of appropriating, setting apart, or assigning to a particular use or person in exclusion of all others; application to a special use or purpose, as of a piece of ground for a park, of a right to one's self, of words to ideas, or of money to carry out some object.

Fisheries in the sea are in most cases a gift of nature practically unlimited in extent, but the Arctic whale fisheries have long been insufficient for the demand, . . . even at the very considerable price necessary to defray the cost of appropriation. J. S. Mill.

2. Anything appropriated or set apart for a special purpose, as money.—3. † Acquisition; addition.

He does nothing but talk of his horse, and he makes it a great appropriation to his own good parts that he can shoe him himself. Shak.

4. In law, (a) the annexing or setting apart of a benefice to the perpetual use of a spiritual corporation. (b) The application by a creditor to one of several debts of a sum of money paid by debtor on a general account.

Appropriative (ap-prō'pri-āt-iv), a. Appropriating; making appropriation.

Appropriator (ap-prō'pri-āt-ėr), n. 1. One who appropriates.

Pitt knew very well that he (Rawdon) was the appropriator of the money which ought to have fallen to his younger brother. Thackeray.

2. In law, one who is possessed of an appropriated benefice.

Appropriatory (ap-prō'pri-e-ta-ri), n. A lay possessor of the profits of a benefice.

Approvable (ap-prōv'a-bl), a. Capable of being approved; meriting approbation.

Approvableness (ap-prōv'a-bl-nes), n. The quality of being approvable.

Approval (ap-prōv'al), n. The act of approving; approbation; commendation; sanction; ratification. 'A censor, . . . without whose approval no capital sentences are to be executed.' Sir W. Temple.

Approvance (ap-prōv'ans), n. Approbation. See APPROVE.

Approve (ap-prōv'), v.t. pret. & pp. approved; ppr. approving. Tennyson has the pp. approven. 'Till he by miracle was approven king.' [Fr. approuver, approver, Pr. aprobar, from L. approbo, to approve, to find good—ad, to, and probus, good. See APPROBATE.] 1. To be pleased with; to admit the propriety or excellence of; to think or judge well or favourably of; to express approbation of; as, on trial the goods were approved; to approve the measures of administration. 'Yet their posterity approve their sayings.' Ps. xlix. 13.

There can be nothing possibly evil which God approveth, and he approveth much more than he doth command. Hooker.

2. To show to be real or true; to prove; to confirm.

Would'st thou approve thy constancy? Approve
First thy obedience. Milton.

What damned error but some sober brow
Will bless it, and approve it with a text. Shak.

3. To put to the test; to prove by trial; to try. 'Of approved valour.' Shak.

Nay, task me to my word; approve me, Lord. Shak.

Hence—4. To convict upon trial or by proof. 'He that is approved in this offence.' Shak. 5. To make or show to be worthy of approbation; to commend to the favourable notice of.

Study to show thyself approved unto God.
2 Tim. ii. 15.

6. In law, to augment the value or profits of to the utmost, as of waste land by inclosing and cultivating it; to improve. Blackstone.—7. To sanction officially; to ratify; as, the decision of the court-martial was approved.—Approved bill, in com. a bill to which no reasonable objection can be made.

Approve (ap-prōv'), v.i. To be pleased; to feel or express approbation; to think or judge well or favourably.

I showed you a piece of black and white stuff, just sent from the dyer; which you were pleased to approve of and be my customer for. Swift.

Approvement (ap-prōv'ment), n. 1. † The act of approving; approbation; liking. 'I did nothing without your approvement.' Hayward.—2. In law, (a) a confession of guilt by a prisoner (the approver) charged with a crime, and accusation of his accomplices. The term is no longer in use; it corresponds to what is now known as turning king's (queen's) evidence. (b) Improvement of common lands by inclosing and converting them to the uses of husbandry.

Approver (ap-prōv'ėr), n. 1. One who approves; formerly, one who made proof or trial.—2. In law, one who confesses a crime and accuses another. See APPROVEMENT, 2. (a).—3. † One who had the letting of the king's domains in small manors; a bailiff or steward of a manor.

Approvingly (ap-prōv'ing-li), adv. In an approving manner.

Approximant † (ap-prok'si-mant), a. Approaching in character. 'Approximant and conformant to the apostolical and pure primitive church.' Sir E. Dering.

Approximate (ap-prok'si-māt), a. [L. L. approximatus, pp. of approximo. See verb.] 1. Near; approaching, especially approaching some state or condition; as, a statement closely approximate to a falsehood.—2. Nearly approaching correctness; nearly true or accurate; not carried out to perfect accuracy; as, an approximate result; an approximate value.—3. In zool. applied to teeth so arranged in the jaw that there is no diastema or vacancy between them, as the teeth of the human species.—4. In bot. applied to a leaf that stands close to the stem.—Approximate quantities, in math. quantities which are nearly but not absolutely equal.

Approximate (ap-prok'si-māt), v.t. pret. & pp. approximated; ppr. approximating. [L. L. approximo, approximatum, to bring or come near—L. ad, to, and proximus, a contracted superlative from prope, near.] To carry or advance near; to cause to approach. 'To approximate the inequality of riches to the level of nature.' Burke.

Approximate (ap-prok'si-māt), v.i. To come near; to approach.

It is the tendency of every dominant system . . . to force its opponents into the most hostile and jealous attitude, from the apprehension which they naturally feel, lest, in those points in which they approximate toward it, they should be misinterpreted and overborne by its authority. J. H. Newman.

Approximately (ap-prok'si-māt-li), adv. In an approximate manner; by approximation.

Approximation (ap-prok'si-mā''shon), n. 1. The act of approximating; a drawing, moving, or advancing near; approach.

The largest capacity and the most noble dispositions are but an approximation to the proper standard and true symmetry of human nature. Jer. Taylor.

2. In math. and physics, (a) a continual approach to a true result; the process by which we can get nearer and nearer to the actual value of a quantity, without being able perhaps ever to arrive at it. (b) A result so obtained; a result which is not rigorously exact, but is so near the truth as to be sufficient for a given purpose.

Approximative (ap-prok'si-mat-iv), a. Approaching; coming near, as to some state or result.

Appui (ap-pwē), n. [Fr.—L. ad, to, and podium, a foot-hold, a height; Gr. pous, podos, a foot.] 1. A support or prop.

If a vine be to climb trees that are of any great height, there would be stays and appuies set to it. Holland.

2. In the manege, a reciprocal action between the mouth of the horse and the hand of the rider, the bit and rein forming the line of communication; thus, a horse with a sensitive mouth may be said to have a good appui, and the same may be said of the rider if his hand be good.—Point d'appui (milit.), a part of the field of operations suited to give support or shelter to troops, as a morass, a wood, a rising ground.

Appulse (ap'puls or ap-puls'), n. [L. appulsus—ad, to, and pello, to drive.] 1. The act of striking against. 'In all consonants there is an appulse of the organs.' Holder.—2. In astron. the approach of any planet to a conjunction with the sun or a star.—3. Arrival; landing. 'The appulse of the ark.' Bryant. [Rare.]

Appulsion (ap-pul'shon), n. The act of striking against.

Appulsive (ap-puls'iv), a. Striking against; impinging; as, the appulsive influence of the planets.

Appulsively (ap-puls'iv-li), adv. By appulsion.

Appurtenance (ap-pėr'ten-ans), n. [Fr. appartenance. See APPERTAIN.] That which appertains or belongs to something else; something belonging to another thing as principal; an adjunct; an appendage; specifically, buildings, rights, and improvements belonging to a principal property; as, a right of pasture in a common attached to an estate; outhouses, gardens, &c., attached to a mansion, and the like. 'Appurtenances of majesty.' Barrow.

Appurtenant (ap-pėr'ten-ant), a. Appertaining or belonging; pertaining; incident. 'Right of way appurtenant to land.' Blackstone.

A part (of land common to a tribe) is allotted in a special way to the chief, as appurtenant to his office, and descends from chief to chief according to a special rule of succession. Edin. Rev.

—Common appurtenant, in law, a common which is annexed to land, and can be claimed only by prescription or immemorial usage, on a legal presumption of a special grant.

Apricate † (ap'ri-kāt), v.i. [L. apricor, apricatus, from apricus, lying open, exposed to the sun.] To bask in the sun. Boyle.

Apricity † (a-pris'i-ti), n. Sunshine. Bailey.

Apricock (ā'pri-kok), n. The original English form of Apricot.

Feed him with apricocks and dewberries,
With purple grapes, green figs, and mulberries. Shak.

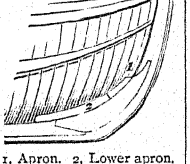
Apricot (ā'pri-kot), n. [O.E. apricock, abricot, Fr. abricot, Sp. albarcoque, from Ar. albirgūk, alburqūq, which seems to be from L. Gr. praikokkion, prekokkion, from L. præcox, præcoquus, early ripe, præcoqua being used by Martial for apricots in opposition to persica or peaches—præ, before, and coquo, to cook, to make ready, to ripen.] A roundish, pubescent fruit of a delicious flavour, the produce of a tree of the plum-kind, Prunus Armeniaca, nat. order Rosaceæ. Its specific name is due to the belief that it is a native of Armenia; but this opinion has been controverted by M. Regnier, a French naturalist, who asserts that it has not been found wild either in that district or in any of the neighbouring provinces, and states his belief that it is a native of Africa, where it flourishes in such abundance on the oases that the fruit is dried and carried to Egypt as an article of commerce. It was introduced into England in 1524 by the gardener of Henry VIII. The tree rises to the height of from 15 to 20, and even 30 feet, and its flowers appear before its leaves. In its wild state the fruit is agreeably subacid. In gardens the apricot-tree is chiefly raised against walls, and propagated by budding upon plum-tree stocks.

April (ā'pril), n. [L. aprilis, contr. from aperilis, the month in which the earth opens for the growth of plants, from aperio, to open. See APERIENT.] The fourth month of the year. With poets April is the type of inconsistency, from the variableness of its weather.

April-fool (ā'pril-fōl), n. One who is sportively imposed upon by others on the 1st of April, as by being sent on some absurd errand.

A priori (ā prī-ō'ri). [L., from something prior or going before.] The opposite of a posteriori, a mode of reasoning by which we proceed from the cause to the effect. To demonstrate anything a priori, means to do it on grounds or reasons preceding actual knowledge or independent of it. Mathematical proofs, for example, are of the a priori kind. On the contrary, judgments or proofs founded on knowledge previously acquired, such as the conclusions of natural history and of all experimental science, are termed a posteriori. Plato is the type of a priori reasoners, Bacon and Locke of a posteriori. Reasoning a priori is called the synthetic method; reasoning a posteriori the analytic. A priori knowledge, in the philosophy of Kant, means not knowledge independent of this or that experience, but knowledge independent of all experience, such as the knowledge of the fact that space has three, and no more than three, dimensions. The marks of a priori knowledge are, first, that it is necessarily true, and second, that it is true of the whole subject.

Apron (ā'prun), n. [O.E. apperon, apern, napron, naprune, nappern, &c., Fr. napperon, from nappe, a table-cloth, &c. (whence E. napkin), nappe being another form of mappe, E. map. Apron has therefore lost an initial n, probably from its being confounded with the n of an the indefinite article; comp. adder, nadder; eft, newt, the last word having received the n.] 1. A piece of cloth or leather worn when at work on the fore-part of the body to keep the clothes clean or defend them from injury. The aprons of silk or other fine material now worn by ladies as a fashionable piece of dress or an ornament are really relics of the time when ladies of rank personally superintended the housekeeping, spending much of their time in the kitchen and larder.—2. Part of the dress of an English bishop, probably the remains of the cassock cut off to the knee.—3. A piece of leather or other material spread before a person riding in a gig or other vehicle, to defend him from rain, mud, dust, and the like.—4. The fat skin covering the belly of a goose. [Provincial.]—5. The abdomen of the short-tailed decapod crustaceans, as the crab.—6. A flat piece of lead that covers the vent of a cannon.—7. A strengthening piece of curved timber in a ship just above the foremost end of the keel. Called also Stomach-piece.—8. A platform or flooring of plank at the entrance of a dock; the sill.—9. The sill or lower part of a window.—10. The piece that holds the cutting tool of a planer.—11. A strip of lead which leads the drip of a wall into a gutter.



1, Apron. 2, Lower apron.

Apron (ā'prun), v.t. To put an apron on; to furnish with an apron. 'A cobbler aproned and a parson gowned.' Pope.

Apron-lining (ā'prun-līn-ing), n. In joinery, the piece of wrought boarding which covers the rough apron-piece of a staircase.

Apron-man (ā'prun-man), n. A man who wears an apron; a labouring man; a mechanic.

> You have made good work,
> You and your apron-men. Shak.

Apron-piece (ā'prun-pēs), n. In joinery, a piece of timber fixed into a wall and projecting horizontally to support the carriage pieces and joistings in the half spaces or landings of a staircase. Called also Pitching-piece.

Apron-string (ā'prun-string), n. The string by which an apron is attached to the person.—To be always at a woman's apron-string, to follow a woman subserviently; to keep dangling about a woman in a fond or childish manner.

Apropos (ap-ro-po), adv. and a. [Fr.—à, to, according to, and propos, purpose, from L. propositum, a thing proposed or purposed—pro, before, and pono, positum, to place.] 1. Opportunely or opportune; seasonably; seasonable; to the purpose: as, his reply was apropos; an apropos remark.—2. By the way; that reminds me; speaking of that: a word used to introduce an incidental observation, suited to the occasion, though not strictly belonging to the narration: often followed by of; as, apropos of that I may mention, &c.

> Mr. Brown is now busy upon his work. Apropos I heard very lately that my friend was the author of that fine little pamphlet that has so irretrievably spoiled the credit and sale of that vain simple book of Weston's. Warburton.

Apse (aps), n. [An anglicized form of apsis,

Apse, Church of Sta Maria-in-Trastevere, Rome.

but now more commonly used than the latter in the architectural sense. See APSIS.] In arch. (a) a portion of any building forming a termination or projection semicircular or polygonal in plan, and having a dome or vaulted roof; especially, the vaulted semicircular or polygonal recess at the east end of the choir or chancel of a church, in which the altar is placed. Apses are found attached to churches in various other positions than at the east end, as projecting from the eastern walls of the transept, or north and south from the transept gables, sometimes at the west end. (b) An arched roof, as of a room or of an oven.

Apsidal (ap'si-dal), a. 1. In astron. pertaining to the apsides. See APSIS.—2. In arch. of or pertaining to, or resembling an apse; as, the apsidal termination of the chancel; an apsidal chapel.

Apsis (ap'sis), n. pl. Apsides (ap-sī'dēz or ap'si-dēz). [Gr. hapsis, a tying, a hoop, a wheel, a bow, arch, vault, from haptō, to connect.] 1. In astron. one of the two points of the orbit of a heavenly body situated at the two extremities of the major axis of the ellipse formed by the orbit, one of the points being that at which the body is at its greatest and the other that at which it is at its least distance from its primary. The point at the greatest distance is called the higher apsis, and that at the least the lower apsis. In regard to the earth and the other planets, these two points correspond to the aphelion and perihelion; and in regard to the moon they correspond to the apogee and perigee. The line of the apsides has a slow forward angular motion in the plane of the planet's orbit, being retrograde only in Venus. This in the earth's orbit produces the anomalistic year.—2. In arch. same as Apse.—3. A reliquary or case in which the relics of saints were kept.—Apsis gradata, the bishop's throne in cathedral churches, so called from being raised by steps above the stalls of the other clergy.

Apt (apt), a. [L. aptus, fitted, fit, pp. of a verb (not used), of which apto, to fit, is a frequentative; Gr. haptō, to tie, to fasten, to reach; Skr. ap, to come up to, to attain.] 1. Fit; suitable. 'A river . . . apt to be forded by a lamb.' Jer. Taylor. 'All the men of might, strong and apt for war.' 2 Ki. xxiv. 16.

> They have not always apt instruments. Burke.

2. Apposite; pertinent; appropriate; as, he used very apt metaphors. 'Apt and gracious words.' Shak.—3. Having a tendency; liable: used of things; as, wheat on moist land is apt to blast or be winter-killed.

> My vines and peaches . . . were apt to have a sort of smuttiness upon their leaves and fruit. Sir W. Temple.

4. Inclined; disposed customarily; ready: used of persons; as, men are too apt to slander others.

> Apter to give than thou wilt be to ask. Beau. & Fl.

5. Ready; quick; expert; as, a pupil apt to learn; an apt wit. 'Supple, sinew-corded, apt at arms.' Tennyson.—6.† Prepared; ready.

> Live a thousand years,
> I shall not find myself so apt to die. Shak.

7.† Capable of easy explanation; natural.

> That Cassio loves her, I do well believe it;
> That she loves him, 't is apt, and of great credit. Shak.

SYN. Fit, meet, suitable, qualified, inclined, disposed, liable, ready, quick, prompt.

Apt† (apt), v.t. To fit; to suit or adapt. 'That our speech be apted to necessary edification.' Jer. Taylor.

Aptable† (apt'a-bl), a. Capable of being adapted. Sherwood.

Aptate† (apt'āt), v.t. To make fit.

Aptenodytes (ap-tē'no-dī''tēz), n. [Gr. aptēnos, wingless, and dytēs, a diver.] The penguins, a genus of web-footed diving-birds, peculiar to the Antarctic shores, by some naturalists included in the Alcidæ or auk family, by others referred to a distinct family called Aptenodytidæ or Spheniscidæ. The great penguin (A. patagonica) is the representative of the genus. See PENGUIN.

Aptenodytidæ (ap-tē'no-dit'i-dē), n. pl. A family of natatorial birds, including the genus Aptenodytes. See APTENODYTES, PENGUIN.

Aptera (ap'tėr-a), n. pl. [Gr. apteros, without wings—a, priv., and pteron, a wing.] The seventh order of insects in Linnæus' system comprehending many genera. To it belong spiders, fleas, earwigs, &c.; also lobsters, crabs, prawns, and shrimps. But later zoologists have distributed these animals very differently, and restricted this term to the orders of insects called Suctoria, Epizoa, and Thysanura, which have no wings.

Apteral (ap'tėr-al), a. [See above.] 1. Destitute of wings.—2. In arch. applied to a building which has no series of columns along its flanks or sides, but is either prostyle or amphiprostyle: opposed to peripteral.

Apteran (ap'tėr-an), n. One of the Aptera; a wingless insect.

Apterous (ap'tėr-us), a. 1. In zool. destitute of wings: applied to insects of the order Aptera.—2. In bot. destitute of membranous expansions, as a stem or petiole: opposed to alate or alated.

Apterygidæ (ap-tėr-ij'i-dē), n. pl. One of the two families of birds (Struthionidæ being the other) into which the Cursores are divided by some naturalists, comprising only the single genus Apteryx. See APTERYX.

Apteryx (ap'tėr-iks), n. [Gr. a, priv., and pteryx, a wing.] A nearly extinct genus of cursorial birds constituting the family Apterygidæ, distinguished from the ostriches by having three toes with a rudimentary hallux, which forms a spur, and a very long bill. Of all the Cursores the Apteryx departs most widely from the general type of the class of birds. Its wings are trifling rudiments, there is no vestige of a tail, its plumage consists of long hair-like feathers, the nostrils are placed at the tip of the bill, and the diaphragm is more complete than in any other bird. There are three species, all natives of New Zealand, found only in the southern parts of the Middle Island, frequenting fern-brakes, where they feed on worms and insects. Of these the A. australis, called kivi-kivi, or kiwi-kiwi by the natives, from its cry, is best known. It is about the size of a small goose, breeds in deep holes, is nocturnal, and is hunted by torchlight for its skin, which is much prized as a material for chiefs' dresses. It defends itself when attacked, inflicting dangerous wounds with its spur-armed feet.

Aptitude (ap'ti-tūd), n. [L.L. aptitudo, from L. aptus, fit, apt.] The state or quality of being apt; as, (a) a natural or acquired disposition or tendency; as, oil has an aptitude to burn; men acquire an aptitude to particular vices.

He that is about children should learn their nature and aptitudes. Locke.

(b) Fitness; suitableness. 'Aptitude . . . for the end to which it was aimed.' Decay of Piety. (c) Readiness in learning; docility. 'He was a boy of remarkable aptitude.' Macaulay.

Aptitudinal† (ap-ti-tūd'in-al), a. Suitable; fit.

Aptly (apt'li), adv. In an apt or suitable manner; as, (a) properly; justly; pertinently. 'That part was aptly fitted.' Shak. 'Irenæus very aptly remarks.' Addison. (b) Readily; quickly; cleverly. 'To learn . . . aptly.' Worcester.

Aptness (apt'nes), n. The state or quality of being apt; as, (a) fitness; suitableness; as, 'the aptness of things to their end.' Hooker. (b) Disposition of the mind; propensity; as, the aptness of men to follow example. (c) Quickness of apprehension; readiness in learning; docility.

What should be the aptness of birds, in comparison of beasts, to imitate speech may be inquired. Bacon.

(d) Tendency: used of things; as, the aptness of iron to rust.

Aptornis (ap-tor'nis), n. A fossil bird about the size of a swan, found in New Zealand along with the remains of the moa. Both belong to the same family (Struthionidæ) of cursorial birds.

Aptote (ap'tōt), n. [Gr. aptōtos, indeclinable—a, priv., and ptotos, verbal adjective from piptō, to fall.] In gram. a noun which has no variation of termination or distinction of cases; an indeclinable noun.

Aptotic (ap-tot'ik), a. Of or pertaining to an aptote: a term applied to a language which has no declensions, &c.

Apus, Apous (ā'pus, ā'pus), n. [Gr. a, not, without, and pous, a foot.] A genus of phyllopod crustaceous animals of the sub-class Entomostraca (which see). They inhabit ditches, lakes, and standing waters, generally in innumerable quantities.

Apyretic (ap-i-ret'ik), a. [Gr. a, without, and pyretos, fever, from pyr, fire.] Without fever; specifically, in med. applied to those days in which the intermission happens in agues, and also to local affections which are not accompanied with febrile excitement.

Apyrexia, Apyrexy (ap-i-rek'si-a, ap'i-rek-si), n. [Gr. apyrexia—a, priv., and pyressō, to be feverish, from pyr, fire.] The absence or intermission of fever; the interval between the paroxysms in intermittent fevers.

Apyrous (a-pī'rus), a. [Gr. apyros, fireless—a, priv., and pyr, fire.] Incombustible, or capable of sustaining a strong heat without alteration of form or properties, as asbestos, mica, talc. Apyrous bodies differ from those simply refractory, inasmuch as the latter, though they are not fused by heat, may be altered by it, while the former are not even altered.

Aqua (ak'wa), n. [L. This word assumes the form eau in French; it is allied to Goth. ahva, A. Sax. eá, Icel. á, O.H.G. aha, water, river.] Water: a word much used in pharmacy and old chemistry.—Aqua fortis (=strong water), a name given to weak and impure nitric acid.—Aqua marina. See AQUAMARINE.—Aqua regia or aqua regalis (=royal water), a name given to a mixture of nitric and hydrochloric acids, from its power of dissolving gold and other noble metals.—Aqua Tofana, a poisonous fluid made about the middle of the seventeenth century by an Italian woman of the name of Tofana or Toffania, who is said to have procured the death of no fewer than 600 individuals by means of it. It consisted chiefly, it is supposed, of a solution of crystallized arsenic.—Aqua vitæ (= water of life), a name familiarly applied to native distilled spirits: it answers to the whisky of Scotland, the usque'baugh of Ireland, the eau de vie of the French.—Aquæ ductus et aquæ haustus, in Scots law, two servitudes, the former consisting in a right of carrying a water-course through the grounds of another; the latter, of watering cattle at a place in the ground of another.

Aquafortis (ak-wa-for'tis), n. See above.

Aquamarine (ak'wa-ma-rēn'), n. [L. aqua, water, and marinus, pertaining to the sea.] A name for the finest beryl, so called from its bluish or sea-green tint.

Aquarian (a-kwā'ri-an), n. One of a sect of Christians in the primitive church who consecrated water in the eucharist instead of wine, either under a pretence of abstinence or because it was unlawful to drink wine.

Aquarium (a-kwā'ri-um), n. [L.] 1. An artificial pond, cistern, or place in a garden or elsewhere for cultivating aquatic plants.—2. A vessel, or series of vessels, constructed wholly or partly of glass in which live animals are kept either in salt or fresh water, along with rocks and aquatic plants. Aquariums on a large scale have been constructed in connection with public parks or gardens, or as distinct institutions, in many cities and towns, as London, Brighton, Berlin, Hamburg, &c.

Aquarius (a-kwā'ri-us), n. [L.] The Water-bearer; a sign in the zodiac which the sun enters about the 21st of January: so called from the rains which prevail at that season in Italy and the East.

Aquatic (a-kwat'ik), a. [L. aquaticus. See AQUA.] Pertaining to water; living in or frequenting water; as, aquatic animals; aquatic fowls; aquatic plants; practised on or in water; as, aquatic sports.—Aquatic box, an accessory to the microscope, generally in the form of a glass cell, in which algæ or animalculæ are placed for observation.

Aquatic (a-kwat'ik), n. 1. A plant which grows in water.—2. pl. Sports or exercises practised on or in water, as rowing or swimming.

Aquatical (a-kwat'ik-al), a. Same as Aquatic. [Rare.]

Aquatile† (ak'wa-til), a. Inhabiting the water. 'The aquatile or water frog.' Sir T. Browne.

Aquatint (ak'wa-tint), n. 1. Same as Aquatinta.—2. An engraving in the aquatint method.

Aquatint (ak'wa-tint), a. Pertaining to the method of engraving called Aquatinta (which see).

Aquatinta (ak-wa-tin'ta), n. [L. aqua, water, and It. tinta, dye, tint.] A method of etching on copper by which a beautiful effect is produced, resembling a fine drawing in sepia, bistre, or Indian ink. This is performed by covering a prepared copper plate with a ground of resin coloured black by powder of asphalt. On this the design is traced, and a complicated series of operations with varnish and dilute aqua fortis is gone through till the effect is produced.

Aquatinter (ak-wa-tint'ér), n. One who practises the art of aquatinting.

Aquatinting (ak-wa-tint'ing), n. The art or process of engraving in the aquatint method.

Aqua-vivarium (ak'wa-vī-vā''ri-um), n. [L. aqua, water, and vivarius, pertaining to living creatures, from vivo, to live.] Same as Aquarium (which see).

Aqueduct (ak'wē-dukt), n. [L. aquæductus—aqua, water, and ductus, a pipe or canal, from duco, to lead. See DUKE.] 1. A conduit or channel for conveying water from one place to another: more particularly applied to structures for conveying water from distant sources for the supply of large cities. Aqueducts were extensively used by the Romans, and many of them still remain in different places on the Continent. They were constructed of stone or wood, sometimes tunnelled through hills, and carried over valleys and rivers on arches. The aqueduct at Segovia, originally built by the Romans, has in some parts two tiers of arcades 100 feet high, is 2921 feet in length, and is one of the most admired works of antiquity. The most remarkable aqueduct of modern times is that constructed by Louis XIV. for conveying the waters of the Eure to Versailles. The aqueduct of the present day formed of iron pipes has rendered these expensive structures unnecessary.—2. In anat. a term applied to certain canals occurring in different parts of the body.

Aqueduct of Segovia, Spain.

Aqueity† (a-kwē'i-ti), n. Wateriness; aqueousness. 'Aqueity, terreity, and sulphureity.' B. Jonson. [Used ludicrously.]

Aqueous (ak'wē-us), a. [From L. aqua, water.] Partaking of the nature of water, or abounding with or formed by it; watery; as, an aqueous solution.—Aqueous humour of the eye, the limpid watery fluid which fills the space between the cornea and the crystalline lens in the eye. See EYE.—Aqueous rocks, in geol. mechanically formed rocks, composed of matter deposited by water. Called also Sedimentary or Stratified Rocks.—Aqueous vapour, the gaseous vapour which is produced from the surface of water by evaporation, and which rises into the atmosphere and returns again to the earth in the form of rain, dew, and snow.—Aqueous tint, in painting, a nearly colourless tint.

Aqueousness (ak'wē-us-nes), n. The quality or state of being aqueous or watery; waterishness; wateriness.

Aquetta (a-kwet'ta), n. [It., little water.] A celebrated Italian poison, more commonly known under the name of Aqua Tofana (which see under AQUA).

Aquiferous (a-kwif'ér-us), a. [L. aqua, water, and fero, to bear.] Conducting water or watery fluid; as, the aquiferous system of the sponges; aquiferous vessels.

Aquifoliaceæ (ak-wi-fō'li-ā''sē-ē), n. pl. [L. acus, a needle, and folium, a leaf.] A nat. order of polypetalous exogens; the holly tribe. The species consist of trees and shrubs, with alternate coriaceous leaves, small flowers in axillary cymes, and a fleshy indehiscent fruit. The useful plants of the order are found in the genus Ilex. The bark of the common holly (I. Aquifolium) yields bird-lime; and from the leaves of another species, I. paraguayensis, is prepared the 'Maté' or Paraguayan tea.

Aquiform (ak'wi-form), a. [L. aqua, water, and forma, form.] In the form of water.

Aquila (ak'wi-la), n. [L. Bopp and Pott refer this word to the root ac, swift, sharp. See ACID.] 1. A genus of raptorial birds containing the true eagles. See EAGLE.—2. A northern constellation containing, according to the British catalogue, seventy-one stars.

Aquilaria (ak-wi-lā'ri-a), n. The type genus of the nat. order Aquilariaceæ (which see).

Aquilariaceæ (ak′wi-lā-ri-ā″shē-ē), n. pl. [Genus Aquilaria, from L. aquila, an eagle, eagle-wood being the name given to A. Agallocha.] A nat. order of apetalous exogens. The species are trees with smooth branches and a tough bark; alternate, entire leaves; the fruit a capsule, pear-shaped, and valved. The order consists of only three genera—Aquilaria, Ophiospermum, and Gyrinops. All the species of the order are natives of the East Indies. A. Agallocha yields agallochum, agal-wood, or eagle-wood. See AGALLOCHUM.

Aquilated (ak′wil-āt-ed), a. In her. adorned with eagles' heads; as, a cross aquilated.

Aquilegia (ak-wi-lē′ji-a), n. [From aquila, an eagle, whose claws the spurs of the petals are supposed to resemble.] A genus of acrid plants, nat. order Ranunculaceæ, widely distributed over the temperate parts of the northern hemisphere. The flowers have five flat, elliptical, coloured sepals, alternating with as many spurred petals; the fruit consists of five follicles with numerous seeds. The spurred petals with incurved heads have been compared to five pigeons, the sepals representing the wings, and to this the English name columbine refers (from L. columba, a pigeon).

Aquilinæ (ak-wi-lī′nē), n. pl. A sub-family of birds, family Falconidæ, order Accipitres or Raptores; the eagles. See EAGLE.

Aquiline (ak′wil-īn), a. [L. aquilinus. See AQUILA.] 1. Of or belonging to the eagle. 'Aquiline ascent.' Young.—2. Resembling an eagle's beak; curving; hooked; prominent.

> Terribly arched and aquiline his nose. Cowper.

Aquilon (ak′wil-on), n. [L. aquilo.] The north wind. Shak. [Rare.]

Aquitanian (ak-wi-tā′ni-an), a. [Celt. Aqui, the name of a people, and tan, country—the country of the Aqui.] Pertaining to Aquitania, one of the great divisions of Gaul, which, according to Cæsar, lay between the Garonne, the Pyrenees, and the ocean, now called Gascony.

Aquite,† v.t. To pay for. Chaucer.

Aquose† (a-kwōs′), a. Watery; aqueous. Bailey.

Aquosity (a-kwos′i-ti), n. The state of being aquose or watery; wateriness; moisture.

> We do not assume that a something called aquosity entered into and took possession of the oxide of hydrogen as soon as it was formed, and then guided the aqueous particles to their places in the facets of the crystal, or among the leaflets of the hoar-frost. Huxley.

Ar (ar), n. [Sc. aur, Icel. örr, Dan. ar, a scar.] A scar or cicatrix; a pockmark.

Arab (ar′ab), n. [Ar. arabah, a desert.] 1. A native of Arabia.—2. A neglected outcast of the streets, particularly an outcast boy or girl: generally called Street Arab. This use of the word is based on the Arabs having no fixed dwelling-places, but being nomadic.

> When he read about the street Arabs, and of the doings of the young fry of thieves, he . . . wiped his eyes, and said, 'God bless me!' Mrs. Riddell.

Arab (ar′ab), a. Of or pertaining to the Arabs or Arabia; as, an Arab steed. 'The delicate Arab arch of her feet.' Tennyson.

Araba (a-rä′ba), n. An Indian or Turkish cart drawn by oxen or cows, and used for travelling: those for the higher classes are usually highly ornamented by carvings on the sides, rich fringes depending from the covering, &c.

Araba.—From Lewis's Constantinople.

Arabesk (ar′ab-esk), a. and n. Same as Arabesque.

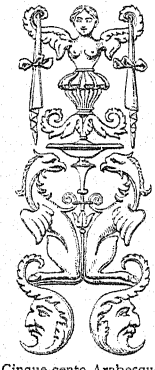
Arabesque (ar′ab-esk), n. [Fr., from It. arabesco. From the Arabs, who brought the style to high perfection, and were at one time supposed to be the originators of it.] A species of ornamentation for enriching flat surfaces, either painted, inlaid, or wrought in low relief. There may be said to be three periods and distinctive varieties of Arabesque—(a) the Roman, or Græco-Roman, introduced into Rome from the East when pure art was declining; (b) the Arabesque of the Moors, as seen in the Alhambra, introduced by them into Europe in the middle ages; (c) Modern Arabesque, which took its rise in Italy in the Renaissance period of art, on the discovery of the decorations on the baths of Titus, and was speedily brought to perfection by Raffaelle and his scholars. The designs of Roman and modern arabesques are generally composed of a fanciful combination of figures of men and animals, real and imaginary, with floral and other ornamental forms. The human figures are generally represented truncated and as growing out of plants or ornaments, or as supported by them, and in their natural colours. There are, however, many classical and modern arabesques composed entirely of ornamental work, plants, fruits, flowers, and the like. The arabesques of the Moors, who are prohibited by their religion from representing animal forms, consist essentially of complicated ornamental designs based on the suggestion of plant-growth, combined with extremely complex geometrical forms. The colouring of Moorish arabesques is entirely conventional and brilliant, yet harmonious. Raffaelle's arabesques on the Loggia of the Vatican owe their excellence to his combining allegory with ornamentation, thus giving poetical expression to what had previously been only a pleasure to the eye.



Cinque-cento Arabesque, from tomb in Church of S. Pietro-in-Vinculo, Rome.

Arabesque (ar′ab-esk), v.t. pret. & pp. arabesqued; ppr. arabesquing. To enrich with arabesque ornaments. 'With its vermilioned initial letters, so prettily arabesqued.' Eclec. Rev.

Arabian (a-rā′bi-an), a. Pertaining to Arabia.

Arabian (a-rā′bi-an), n. A native of Arabia; an Arab.

Arabic (ar′ab-ik), a. Belonging to Arabia or the language of its inhabitants.—Arabic figures or characters, the numeral characters now used in our arithmetic, which were introduced into England about the eleventh century, and are probably of Indian origin.

Arabic (ar′ab-ik), n. The language of the Arabians.

Arabical (a-rab′ik-al), a. Arabian; Arabic.

Arabically (a-rab′ik-al-li), adv. In an Arabic or Arabian manner.

Arabin, Arabine (ar′a-bin), n. ($C_{12}H_{22}O_{11}$.) A variety of gum soluble in cold water, the principal constituent of gum-arabic.

Arabis (ar′a-bis), n. [From Arabia, of which the more important species are natives.] A genus of plants of the cruciferous order; wall or rock cress. Several species are natives of Britain, but they are of little interest. Foreign specimens with white or sometimes purple flowers are largely cultivated in rock-work and borders in our gardens.

Arabism (ar′ab-izm), n. An Arabic idiom or peculiarity of language.

Arabist (ar′ab-ist), n. One well versed in the Arabic language or literature.

Arable (ar′a-bl), a. [Fr. arable, from L. arabilis, that can be tilled, from aro, to plough, from a widely spread root seen also in Gr. aroō, A. Sax. erian, E. to ear, Icel. erja, Goth. erjan, G. ähren, eren, O.H.G. aran, erran, Lith. arti, Rus. orati, to plough, to till; Ir. W. ar, tillage; W. aru, to plough.] Fit for ploughing or tillage.—Arable land, land which is chiefly cultivated by means of the plough, as distinguished from grass-land, wood-land, common pasture, and waste.

Arabo-tedesco (ăr′ab-ō-tā-des′kō), n. [It., from arabo, Arabic, and tedesco, German.] In arch. a style of art composed of Moorish, Roman, and German-Gothic. Almost synonymous with Byzantine.

Aracanese (ar′a-kan-ēz″), n. A native or an inhabitant, or natives or inhabitants, of Aracan or Arracan, in province of British Burmah.

Aracanese (ar′a-kan-ēz″), a. Pertaining to Aracan or its inhabitants.

Araçari (ä-rä-sä′ri), n. [Native name.] A name of the birds belonging to the genus Pteroglossus, included in the Ramphastidæ or toucan family, and differing from the true toucans by a smaller bill and smaller size. The araçaris breed in the hollows of decayed trees, which they enlarge by means of their beak. The prevailing colour of their plumage is green, often varied with spaces or bands of black, or brilliant red and yellow. They are natives of the warm parts of South America.

Arace,† v.t. [O.Fr. aracer, Fr. arracher, to pull up, from L. eradicare—e, out, and radix, radicis, a root.] To tear up by the roots; to draw away by force.

> The children from hir arm they gonne arace. Chaucer.

Araceæ (a-rā′sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of monocotyledonous plants, having the genus Arum as the type. The species are herbaceous, with leaves sheathing at the base; the flowers are unisexual and without a perianth, on a spadix protected when young by a spathe; the anthers are nearly sessile, and the fruit succulent. Most of the species have tuberous roots abounding in starch, which forms a wholesome food after the acrid juice has been washed out. British or Portland arrow-root is manufactured from the roots of Arum maculatum (the wake-robin or cuckoo-pint). The species are natives chiefly of tropical countries, and a principle of acridity generally pervades them, existing in so strong a degree in some as to render them dangerous poisons, as Dieffenbachia seguina (the dumb-cane of the West Indies and South America), which Araceæ.

Cuckoo-pint or Wake-robin (Arum maculatum). a, Spadix. b b, Stamens or male flowers. c c, Ovaries or female flowers. d, Spathe or sheath. e, Cormus.

receives its popular name from its acrid juice swelling the tongue of any one chewing it, and so destroying the power of speech. A gigantic species (Godwinia gigas), discovered in Nicaragua and brought to Britain, produces but one leaf supported on a stalk 10 feet long. See GODWINIA.

Araceous (a-rā′shus), a. Pertaining to the nat. order of plants Araceæ.

Arachis (ar′a-kis), n. A genus of leguminous plants much cultivated in warm climates, and esteemed a valuable article of food. The most remarkable feature of the genus is that when the flower falls the stalk supporting the small undeveloped fruit lengthens, and bending towards the ground pushes the fruit into the ground, when it begins to enlarge and ripen. The best-known species is A. hypogœa. Its pod (popularly called ground, earth, or pea nut), when mature, is oblong, often contracted in the middle, wrinkled, of a pale yellow colour, and contains two seeds the size of a hazel-nut, in flavour sweet as almonds, and yielding, when pressed, an oil not inferior to that of olives. It grows to the height of 1 or 2 feet. —Arachis oil, the oil expressed from the seeds of Arachis hypogœa, the fine limpid nut-oil of commerce.

Arachnida (a-rak′ni-da), n. pl. [Gr. arachnē, a spider; akin L. aranea.] A class of articulated, annulose, and wingless animals, intermediate between insects and Crustacea, including spiders, mites, and scorpions. They are oviparous animals, provided with articulated members and a united head and thorax; but they do not undergo a metamorphosis similar to insects. The antennæ are modified into jaw-like organs. They respire by tracheæ, or by pulmonary sacs, or by the skin.

Arachnidan (a-rak'ni-dan), n. One of the Arachnida.

Arachnoid (a-rak'noid), a. [Gr. arachnē, a spider, and eidos, form.] 1. Resembling a spider's web; specifically, in bot. seeming to be covered with cobweb, in consequence of the entanglement of long white hairs.—2. Pertaining to the Arachnida.—Arachnoid canal, in anat. a canal formed by the extension of the arachnoid membrane over the transverse and longitudinal fissures of the brain.—Arachnoid membrane, in anat. (a) a semi-transparent thin membrane which is spread over the brain and pia mater, and for the most part closely connected with the latter. Also called the Arachnoid Tunic. The term has also been applied to that capsule of the crystalline lens which is a continuation of the hyaloid membrane. (b) A membrane supposed by some anatomists to exist between the sclerotic and choroid membranes of the eye.

Arachnoid (a-rak'noid), n. 1. A species of madrepore occurring fossil.—2. In anat. the arachnoid membrane or tunic. See under the adjective.—Arachnoid of the eye. See under the adjective, Arachnoid membrane, (b).

Arachnoiditis, Arachnitis (a-rak'noi-dī"tis, a-rak-nī'tis), n. Inflammation of the arachnoid membrane.

Arachnologist (ar-ak-nol'o-jist), n. One versed in arachnology.

Arachnology (ar-ak-nol'o-ji), n. [Gr. arachnē, a spider, and logos, discourse.] That branch of natural history which treats of spiders.

Arack (ar'ak), n. See ARRACK.

Arad (ar'ad), n. A member of the natural order Araceæ. Lindley.

Ræometer (ar-ē-om'e-tėr), n. See AREOMETER.

Ræostyle (a-rē'o-stīl), n. [Gr. araios, thin, rare, and stylos, a column.] In arch. a columnar arrangement where the columns are placed far apart. The interval usually assigned is four diameters.

Ræosystyle (a-rē'o-sis"tīl), n. [Gr. araios, rare, syn, together with, and stylos, a column.] In arch. an arrangement in which columns are coupled or placed in pairs, with an interval generally of half a diameter betwixt the coupled columns, and of three diameters and a half betwixt the pairs.

Aragonese (ar-a-gon-ēz'), n. A native or inhabitant, or natives or inhabitants, of the province of Aragon in Spain.

Aragonese (ar-a-gon-ēz'), a. Pertaining to Aragon or its inhabitants.

Aragonite (ar'a-gon-īt), n. [From Aragon in Spain.] The name given to carbonate of calcium when it occurs in trimetric crystals. This mineral is essentially of the same chemical constitution as calc-spar, but its crystalline form is different, carbonate of calcium being a dimorphous mineral. Written also Arragonite.

Araguato (à-rä-gwä'tō), n. The Mycetes Ursinus, or ursine howler, the largest of the New World monkeys hitherto noticed, its length being nearly 3 feet, and the tail reaching to even a greater length. Like all the family it is characterized by its discordantly dismal yells, heard at a mile's distance.

Araignée, Arraign (a-rān-yā, a-rān'), n. [Fr., properly a spider.] In fort. a kind of underground work consisting of several branches or galleries starting from one point.

Arainæ (a-rā-ī'nē), n. pl. [Ara, a native name of the macaws.] The macaws, a subfamily of scansorial birds, family Psittacidæ; the Psittacinæ of Finsch. See MACAW.

Araise† (a-rāz'), v.t. [A. Sax. arasian, to raise.] To raise, especially from the dead. '(A medicine) whose simple touch is powerful to araise King Pepin.' Shak.

Arak (ar'ak), n. An alcoholic drink made in Tartary from mare's milk fermented. Called also Arki, Arsa.

Araki (ar'ak-ē), n. An Egyptian intoxicating drink prepared from dates; a kind of arrack.

Aralia (a-rā'li-a), n. A genus of plants with small flowers arranged in umbels, and succulent berries, the type of the nat. order Araliaceæ (which see).

Araliaceæ (a-rā'li-ā"sē-ē), n. pl. A nat. order of plants nearly related to the Umbelliferæ, from which they are distinguished chiefly by their three or more celled fruit, simple epigynous disc, usually valvate corolla, and more shrubby habit. The species are natives chiefly of the tropical and subtropical regions of the world, and are sometimes called ivy-worts. The order is represented in Britain by the ivy (Hedera Helix). The ginseng, highly esteemed by the Chinese as a stimulant, is produced by Panax schinseng, a plant found in Northern Asia; the ginseng of North America (P. quinquefolium) is less valued. A species of Aralia (A. nudicaulis) is used in North America as a substitute for sarsaparilla. The true rice-paper of the Chinese, obtained only from the island of Formosa, is made from the pith of another species, A. papyrifera.

Aramaic (ar-a-mā'ik), a. Of or pertaining to Aram, a son of Shem, or to the Chaldeans and Syrians, his descendants; Chaldean; Chaldaic; specifically, a term appellative of the northern family of the Semitic class of languages. Written also Aramean, Aramæan.

Aramaic (ar-a-mā'ik), n. The name applied to the northern group of the Semitic class of languages. It comprises the tongues spoken in Syria and Assyria, the earliest specimens being the Chaldee passages in the Old Testament and Apocrypha, especially in Esdras and Daniel; Chaldaic; Chaldee.

Aramean, Aramæan (ar-a-mē'an), a. See ARAMAIC.

Aramism, Arameanism (ar'am-izm, ar-a-mē'an-izm), n. An idiom of the Aramaic or Chaldee language; a Chaldaism.

Araneidæ (a-rā-nē'i-dē), n. pl. [L. aranea, a spider.] The spider family, a tribe of the pulmonary order of arachnidans, and containing the true spinning spiders. See SPIDER.

Araneide, Araneidan (a-rā'nē-īd, a-rā-nē'i-dan), n. One of the Araneidæ.

Araneiform (a-rā-nē'i-form), a. [L. aranea, a spider, and E. form.] Resembling a spider; having the form of a spider.

Araneiformia (a-rā-nē'i-for"mi-a), n. pl. [See ARANEIFORM.] An order of spider-like crustacea, including only a small number of species. They have a suctorial mouth, and four pairs of long jointed legs, adapted solely for walking.

Araneose (a-rā'nē-ōs), a. Covered with hairs crossing each other, like the rays in a spider's web.

Araneous (a-rā'nē-us), a. [L. aranea, a spider or cobweb.] Resembling a cobweb; extremely thin and delicate, like a cobweb; as, the araneous membrane of the eye. See ARACHNOID.

Arango (a-rang'gō), n. pl. Arangoes (a-rang'gōz). A species of bead made of rough carnelian, generally of a cylindrical shape. They constituted an article of traffic with Africa previous to the abolition of the slave-trade, and were imported from Bombay.

Arapaima (ar-a-pī'ma), n. A genus of freshwater malacopterygian abdominal fishes, remarkable for their size and the mosaic work of their strong bony compound scales. They are the largest known fresh-water fishes, some being 15 feet long and weighing 4 cwt. See SUDIS.

Arapunga (ar-a-pung'ga), n. A genus of South American dentirostral insessorial birds, family Ampelidæ, including the curious bell-bird or campanero (A. alba), remarkable for its clear, far-sounding, bell-like notes, rendered all the more striking that they are continued through the heat of the day when all other birds are silent. It is about the size of a pigeon, but is easily distinguished from it by the strange tubular horn-like structure which grows on its forehead, and when empty of air is pendulous, but rises when the bird is excited to the height of 3 inches. As this horn has a communication with the palate it has probably something to do with the peculiar sound of the bird's voice. Its plumage is pure white.

Head of Arapunga or Bell-bird (A. alba).

Ara-root (ar'a-röt), n. Same as Arrow-root.

Aration (a-rā'shon), n. [L. aratio. See ARABLE.] Ploughing; tillage. [Rare.]

> It would suffice to teach these four parts of agriculture; first aration, and all things belonging to it. Cowley.

Aratory (ar'a-to-ri), a. Relating or contributing to tillage.

Aratrum terræ (a-rā'trum tėr'rē). In Scots law, a ploughgate of land, consisting of eight oxgates of land, because anciently the plough was drawn by eight oxen.

Araucaria (ar-a-kā'ri-a), n. [From the Araucanos, a tribe of Indians in the southern parts of Chili.] A genus of Coniferæ, found in South America, Australia, and some of the islands of the Pacific. The species are large evergreen trees with verticillate spreading branches, and bearing large cones, each scale having a single large seed. The species best known in Britain is A. imbricata (the Chili pine or puzzle-monkey), which is quite hardy. It is a native of the mountains of Southern Chili, where it forms vast forests and yields a hard durable wood. Its seeds are eaten when roasted. The Moreton Bay pine of N. S. Wales (A. Cunninghamii) supplies a valuable timber used in house and boat building, in making furniture, and in other carpenter-work. A species, A. excelsa, abounds on Norfolk Island, attaining a height of 200 feet. See NORFOLK-ISLAND PINE.

Araucarian (ar-a-kā'ri-an), a. Related to the araucarias.

Araucarite (a-rą'ka-rīt), n. The name given to fragments of plants found fossil in strata of different ages, and which are believed to be related to the living araucaria. Trunks occur in the coal-measures in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, which have belonged to immense coniferous trees, referred, but with some doubt, to this genus. The fruits and foliage found in the secondary rocks are certainly closely related to the Australian araucarias.

Arauha (a-rä'ū-a), n. The native name for a gigantic spider of the genus Mygale, found on the Alvolhos Islands, Brazil, which preys on lizards and even on young chickens.

Arbalist, Arbalest (är'bal-ist, är'bal-est), n. [Contr. from arcubalist, O.Fr. arbaleste, from L. arcus, a bow, and ballista, balista, an engine to throw stones, from Gr. ballō, to throw.] A cross-bow, consisting of a steel bow set in a shaft of wood, furnished with a string and trigger. The shaft or stock had a stirrup at the end, and the bow was wound up by a moulinet or windlass worn at the girdle. (See MOULINET.) It served to throw bullets, darts, arrows, &c. Called also Arblast, and Arbalet.

Arbalister (är'bal-ist-ėr), n. A cross-bowman.

Arbiter (är'bit-ėr), n. [L., a witness, an umpire.] 1. A person appointed or chosen by parties in controversy to decide their differences.

> The civilians make a difference between arbiter and arbitrator, the former being obliged to judge according to the customs of the law; whereas the latter is at liberty to use his own discretion, and accommodate the difference in that manner which appears most just and equitable. Warburton.

2. In a general sense, a person who has the power of judging and determining without control; one whose power of deciding and governing is not limited. 'For Jove is arbiter of both to man.' Cowper. 'His majesty, . . . the sole arbiter of the affairs of Christendom.' Sir W. Temple.—SYN. Arbitrator, umpire, controller, ruler, governor.

Arbiter† (är'bit-ėr), v.t. To act as arbiter between; to judge. Hall.

Arbitrable† (är'bi-tra-bl), a. 1. Arbitrary. Spelman.—2. Determinable.

> The value of moneys is arbitrable according to the use of several kingdoms. Ep. Hall.

Arbitrage (är'bit-rāj), n. 1. Arbitration. R. Cobden. [Rare.]—2. Calculation of equivalents in foreign currency. See ARBITRATION.

Arbitrament (är-bit'ra-ment), n. 1. Determination; decision; settlement; as, to put to the arbitrament of the sword.

Gladly at this moment would MacIvor have put their quarrel to personal arbitrament. Sir W. Scott.

2. The award of arbitrators: in this sense award is more generally used. Cowell.

Arbitrarily (är'bi-tra-ri-li), adv. In an arbitrary manner; according to one's pleasure or caprice; capriciously.

Arbitrariness (är'bi-tra-ri-nes), n. The quality of being arbitrary.

Arbitrarious† (är-bi-trā'ri-us), a. Arbitrary. Norris.

Arbitrariously† (är-bi-trā'ri-us-li), adv. Arbitrarily. Barrow.

Arbitrary (är'bi-tra-ri), a. [L. arbitrarius, from arbitrari, to decide on one's own judgment, from arbiter.] 1. Given, adjudged, or done according to one's will or discretion; as, an arbitrary decision; an arbitrary punishment. 'Arbitrary calculations, and such as vary at pleasure.' Sir T. Browne.—2. Exercised according to one's will or discretion.

Arbitrary power is most easily established on the ruins of liberty abused to licentiousness. Washington.

3. Despotic; absolute in power; having no external control; as, an arbitrary prince or government.—4. Dependent on one's own will or choice; to be determined by one's own will. 'Indifferent things are left arbitrary to us.' Bp. Hall. [Rare.]—5. Held at the will or pleasure, whether of one's self or another. 'Arbitrary curacies.' H. Wharton.—SYN. Capricious, absolute, despotic, unlimited, uncontrolled, tyrannical, imperative, imperious, peremptory.

Arbitrate (är'bi-trāt), v.i. pret. & pp. arbitrated; ppr. arbitrating. [L. arbitror, arbitratus, to be witness of a thing, hence to judge of it, to give a decision, from arbiter (which see).] 1. To act as an arbitrator; as, to choose men to arbitrate between us.—2. To decide; to determine.

In this contest strokes must arbitrate. Shak.

Arbitrate (är'bi-trāt), v.t. 1. To hear and decide as arbitrator; as, to arbitrate a disputed case.—2. To decide or determine generally.

Things must be compared to and arbitrated by her (wisdom's) standard, or else they will contain something of monstrous enormity. Barrow.

Arbitration (är-bi-trā'shon), n. The hearing and determination of a cause between parties in controversy, by a person or persons chosen by the parties. This may be done by one person, but it is common to choose more than one. Frequently two are nominated, one by each party, with a third, who is called the umpire (or, in Scotland, sometimes the oversman), and who is called on to decide in case of the primary arbitrators differing. In such a case the umpire may be agreed upon either by the parties themselves, or by the arbitrators, when they have received authority from the parties to the dispute to do so. The determination of arbitrators is called an award. By the law of England the authority of an arbitrator cannot be revoked by any of the parties without the leave of the court or of a judge.—Arbitration bond, a bond by which a party to a dispute engages to abide by the award of arbitrators.—Arbitration of exchange, an operation by which the currency of one country is converted into that of another through the medium of intervening currencies, for the purpose of ascertaining whether direct or indirect drafts and remittances are preferable.

Arbitrator (är'bi-trāt-ėr), n. 1. A person chosen by parties who have a controversy, to determine their differences, or one of two or more persons chosen for that purpose.—2. One who has the power of deciding or prescribing without control; an absolute governor, president, or arbiter. See ARBITER.

Though heaven be shut,
And heaven's high Arbitrator sit secure. Milton.

The end crowns all,
And that old common arbitrator, Time,
Will one day end it. Shak.

Arbitratrix (är'bi-trāt-riks), n. A female who arbitrates or judges.

Arbitrement (är-bit're-ment), n. Same as Arbitrament.

Arbitress (är'bit-res), n. A female arbiter.

Arbitry,† n. [L. arbitrium, free-will.] Free-will; judgment. Chaucer.

Arblast (är'blast), n. A crossbow; an arbalist.

The warder was ready with his arblast. Sir W. Scott.

Arbor (är'bor), n. [L., a tree, and hence a mast, a wooden bar, &c.] 1. In bot. a tree, as distinguished from a shrub, that is, a woody perennial plant having a distinct bole or trunk from which the main branches grow. Lindley.—2. In mech. the principal spindle or axis of a machine, communicating motion to the other moving parts.—Arbor Dianæ, or tree of silver (that metal having been called Diana by the alchemists), a beautiful arborescent precipitate, produced by silver in mercury. Other similar precipitates are formed by other metals.

Arbor, n. Same as Arbour.

Arborary† (är'bo-ra-ri), a. Belonging to trees. Bailey.

Arborator† (är'bo-rāt-ėr), n. One who plants or who prunes trees.

Arboreal, a. See ARBOREOUS.

Arbored (är'bord), a. Furnished with an arbor or axis.

Arboreous, Arboreal (är-bō'rē-us, är-bō'rē-al), a. [L. arboreus, from arbor, a tree.] 1. Pertaining or belonging to trees; living on or among trees; frequenting woods.—2. Having the form, constitution, and habits of a tree; having more or less the character of a tree.

Arborescence (är-bor-es'ens), n. [L. arboresco, to grow to a tree.] 1. The state of being arborescent.—2. Something having the figure of a tree; the resemblance of a tree in minerals or crystallizations, or groups of crystals in that form.

Arborescent (är-bor-es'ent), a. [L. arborescens, pp. of arboresco, to grow to a tree.] Resembling a tree; specifically, in bot. partaking of the nature and habits of a tree; possessing certain qualities of a tree though wanting others; dendritic.

Arboret† (är'bor-et), n. 1. [See next article.] A place planted with trees; an arboretum. 'Thick-woven arborets.' Milton.—2. [Possibly from It. arboretto, a little tree.] A shrub.

No arborett with painted blossomes drest
And smelling sweete, but there it might be fownd
To bud out faire, and throwe her sweete smels al arownd. Spenser.

Arboretum (är-bo-rē'tum), n. [L., a plantation of trees or shrubs.] A place in which a collection of different trees and shrubs is cultivated for scientific or educational purposes.

Arborical† (är-bor'ik-al), a. Relating to trees. Smart.

Arboricultural (är-bor'i-kul"tūr-al), a. Relating to arboriculture.

Arboriculture (är'bo-ri-kul"tūr), n. [L. arbor, a tree, and cultura, cultivation. See CULTURE.] The cultivation of trees; the art of planting, dressing, and managing trees and shrubs.

Arboriculturist (är'bo-ri-kul"tūr-ist), n. One who practises arboriculture.

Arboriform (är-bor'i-form), a. [L. arbor, a tree, and forma, form.] Having the form of a tree.

Arborist† (är'bor-ist), n. One who makes trees his study, or who is versed in the knowledge of trees. 'Our cunning arborists.' Evelyn.

Arborization (är'bor-iz-ā"shon), n. A growth or appearance resembling the figure of a tree or plant, as in minerals or fossils.

Arborized (är'bor-īzd), a. Having a tree-like appearance. 'An arborized or moss agate.' Wright.

Arborous (är'bor-us), a. Having the appearance or nature of an arbour. 'From under shady arborous roofs.' Milton.

Arbor-vitæ (är'bor-vi'tē), n. [L., the tree of life.] 1. In bot. a common name of the species of Thuja, belonging to the nat. order Coniferæ. Thuja occidentalis is the American or common arbor-vitæ of gardens.—2. In anat. a dendriform arrangement which appears in the medullary substance of the brain when the cerebellum is cut vertically.

Arbour, Arbor (är'bėr), n. [Either from O.E. herbere, a place for the cultivation of herbs or plants, or another form of harbour.] A seat in the open air sheltered by trees, the branches of which are trained so as to form a roof, or by climbing plants growing on trees or a frame of lattice-work; a bower. 'A fine close arbor.' Sir P. Sidney.

Arboured (är'bėrd), a. Furnished with an arbour.

Arbour-vine (är'bėr-vīn), n. A species of bindweed. [United States.]

Arbuscle (är'bus-l), n. [L. arbuscula, a little tree, dim. of arbor, a tree.] A dwarf tree, in size between a shrub and a tree. Bradley.

Arbuscular (är-bus'kū-lėr), a. [From L. arbuscula. See preceding article.] Resembling a shrub; having the figure of small trees.

Arbustive (är-bust'iv), a. [L. arbustivus, from arbustum, a plantation.] Containing copses of trees or shrubs; covered with shrubs.

Arbustum (är-bust'um), n. [L., from arbos or arbor, a tree.] A copse of shrubs or trees; an orchard.

Arbute (är-būt'), n. [L. arbutus.] The strawberry-tree. See ARBUTUS.

Arbutean (är-bū-tē'an), a. Pertaining to the arbutus or strawberry-tree.

Arbutus (är'bū-tus), n. [L., the strawberry-tree.] A genus of evergreen shrubs, nat. order Ericaceæ, characterized by its fruit being a berry, containing many seeds. The bright red or yellow berries, somewhat like the strawberry, have an unpleasant taste and narcotic properties. The Corsicans make wine from them. Arbutus Unedo abounds near the lakes of Killarney, where its fine foliage adds charms to the scenery. —Trailing arbutus, the American name of Epigæa repens, nat. order Ericaceæ.

Arc (ärk), n. [L. arcus, a bow.] 1. In geom. any part of a curve line which is not of contrary curvature; an arc of a circle, for example, is any portion of its circumference. It is by means of circular arcs that all angles are measured, the arc being described from the angular point as a centre.—Concentric arcs are such as have the same centre.—Equal arcs are such arcs of the same circle, or of equal circles, as contain the same number of degrees and parts of a degree.—Similar arcs, of unequal circles, are such as contain the same number of degrees, or that are the like part or parts of their respective whole circles.—2. In arch. an arch. [Rare.]

Arc.

Turn arcs of triumph to a garden gate. Pope.

—3. In elect. the curve formed by a current leaping across the small interval between two carbon pencils. See ELECTRIC in SUPP.

Arca (är'ka), n. [L., a box, drawer, or coffin.] 1. In the early church, (a) a chest for receiving pecuniary offerings. (b) A box or casquet in which the eucharist was carried.—2. A genus of lamellibranchiate molluscs, the type of the family Arcadæ; the ark-shells.

Arcadæ (är'ka-dē), n. pl. The ark-shells, a family of lamellibranchiate molluscs, section Asiphonida, having the shell equivalve, the hinge long, with many comb-like equal teeth. They burrow in sand near the coast, or are attached to rocks, stones, &c. Their distribution is world-wide, their first appearance being in the Lower Silurian rocks. Arca is the typical genus of the family.

Arcade (är-kād'), n. [Fr., from L.L. arcata, and that from L. arcus, an arch.] 1. Properly, a series of arches supported on piers or pillars: used generally as the screen and roof support of an ambulatory or walk, but in the architecture of the middle ages more commonly applied as an ornamental dressing to a wall, as in the figure.—2. A simple arched opening in a wall. [Rare.]—3. A vault. [Rare.]—4. A lane or passage in a town, containing shops or stalls, and usually covered with glass; as, the Burlington Arcade; the Lowther Arcade.

Arcaded (är-kād'ed), a. Furnished with an arcade.

Arcadian (är-kā'di-an), n. A native or inhabitant of Arcadia.

Arcadian, Arcadic (är-kā'di-an, är-kā'dik), a. Pertaining to Arcadia, a mountainous district in the heart of the Peloponnesus.

Arcanum (är-kān'um), n. pl. Arcana (ärkān'a). [L., from arcanus, closed, secret, from arceo, to keep in.] 1. A secret; a mystery: generally used in the plural; as, the arcana of nature. 'Inquiries into the arcana of the Godhead.' Warburton.—2. In old med. a secret remedy reputed to be very efficacious.—3. In old chem. the secret virtue of anything.

Arcboutant (ärk-bō-tän), n. [Fr. arc-boutant—arc, an arch, and O.Fr. boutant, ppr. of bouter, to prop.] In arch. an arch-formed buttress. See FLYING-BUTTRESS.

Arch (ärch), n. [Fr. arche, L.L. archia, from L. arcus, a bow, an arch, an arc.] 1. In geom. any part of the circumference of a circle or other curve; an arc. See ARC, 1.—2. In arch. a structure composed of separate inelastic bodies, having the shape of truncated wedges, arranged on a curved line, so as to retain their position by mutual pressure. Arches are usually constructed of stones or of bricks. The separate stones which compose the arch are called voussoirs or arch-stones; the extreme or lowest voussoirs are termed springers, and the uppermost or central one is called the keystone. The under or concave side of the voussoirs v, Voussoirs or arch-stones. k, Keystone.

S, Springers. In. Intrados. Ex. Extrados.

is called the intrados, and the upper or convex side the extrados of the arch. When the curves of the intrados and extrados are concentric or parallel, the arch is said to be extradosed. The supports which afford resting and resisting points to the arch are called piers and abutments. The upper part of the pier or abutment where the arch rests—technically where it springs from—is the impost. The span of an arch is in circular arches the length of its chord, and generally the width between the points of its opposite imposts whence it springs. The rise of an arch is the height of the highest point of its intrados above the line of the impost; this point is sometimes called the under side of the crown, the highest point of the extrados being the crown. Arches are designated in two ways: first, in a general manner, according to their properties, cycloidal, elliptical, parabolical, hyperbolical, or catenarian arches; or from the resemblance of the whole contour of the curve to some familiar object, as lancet arch and horse-shoe arch; or from the method used in describing the curve, as equilateral, three-centred, four-centred, ogee, and the like. When any arch has one of its imposts higher than the other it is said to be rampant.—Foil arches, arches whose outlines are curved into a series of subordinate arches called foils, the points of which are termed cusps. A numeral is usually employed to designate the number of foils, as a trefoil arch, a cinquefoil arch, &c.—3. Any place covered with an arch; as, to pass into the arch of a bridge.—4. Any curvature in the form of an arch; as, the arch of the aorta.

Whereon a sapphire throne, inlaid with pure
Amber, and colours of the flowery arch. Milton.

5. In mining, a piece of ground left unworked near a shaft.—Triumphal arch, in Rom. antiq. originally a simple arch festooned and otherwise decorated, erected generally at the entrance of a city, though sometimes in the street, under which a victorious general and army passed in triumph. At a later period the triumphal arch was a richly sculptured, massive, and permanent structure, having an archway passing through it, with generally a smaller arch on either side. The name is sometimes given to an arch, generally of wood decorated with flowers, erected on occasion of some public rejoicing, &c.

Arch (ärch), v.t. 1. To cover or span with an arch; as, to arch a gate.

The proud river . . . is arched over with a curious pile of stones. Howell.

2. To curve or form into the shape of an arch; as, the horse arches his neck. 'Fine devices of arching water without spilling.' Bacon.

Arch (ärch), v.i. To make an arch or arches.

The nations of the field and wood
Build on the wave or arch beneath the sand. Pope.

Arch (ärch), a. [G. D. Sw. Dan. arg, crafty, roguish; Icel. argr, A. Sax. earg, faint-hearted. See ARRANT.] Cunning; sly; shrewd; waggish; mischievous for sport; roguish. 'So arch a leer.' Tatler.

He had the reputation of an arch lad at school.
Swift.

Arch (ärch), a. [From Gr. archi, from stem of archē, the beginning, first place or power, archō, to be first, to command, to rule.] Chief; of the first class; principal.

The tyrannous and bloody deed is done,
The most arch act of piteous massacre
That ever yet this land was guilty of. Shak.

[This word is principally used in composition as the first part of many compound words; as, *arch*bishop, arch-priest, &c.]

Arch† (ärch), n. [Gr. archos, a leader. See ARCH, a.] A leader; a chief.

My worthy arch and patron comes to-night. Shak.

Archæocidaris (ärˈkē-ō-sidˈˈa-ris), n. [Gr. archaios, ancient, and kidaris, a turban.] A genus of fossil sea-urchins or Cidaris, found in the coal-measures and Permian strata, characterized by their small hexagonal plates and long spines, which in some species are smooth, in others notched and sharply denticulated.

Archæography (ärˈkē-ogˈra-fi), n. [Gr. archaios, ancient, and graphō, a writing.] A writing or treatise on antiquity.

Archæologian (ärˈkē-o-lōˈˈji-an), n. An archæologist.

Archæological, Archæologic (ärˈkē-o-lojˈˈ-ik-al, ärˈkē-o-lojˈˈik), a. Pertaining to archæology; as, archæological researches.

Archæologist (ärˈkē-olˈo-jist), n. One skilled in archæology.

Archæology (ärˈkē-olˈo-ji), n. [Gr. archaios, ancient, and logos, discourse.] The science of antiquities, especially prehistoric antiquities; that science or branch of knowledge which investigates the history of nations and peoples by means of the remains, architectural, implemental, or the like, which belong to the earlier epoch of their existence.—Archæology, Antiquarianism. Archæology, in its strict application, treats of prehistoric matters, and is thus allied to geology; antiquarianism deals more particularly with subjects within the period embraced by history. Archæology interprets without the aid of written record or trustworthy tradition; antiquarianism avails itself of both.

Archæopteryx (ärˈkē-opˈtèr-iks), n. [Gr. archaios, ancient, and pteryx, wing.] A unique fossil bird from the oolitic limestone of Solenhofen, of the size of a rook, and differing from all known birds in having two free claws representing the thumb and forefinger projecting from the wing, and about twenty tail vertebræ free and prolonged as in mammals.

Archæus (ärˈkēˈus), n. [L.L. archæus, from Gr. archē, beginning.] A term used especially by Paracelsus and Van Helmont, and signifying the vital principle which presides over the growth and continuation of living beings; the principle or power which presides over every particle of organized bodies, and to which it gives form; an immaterial principle existing in the seed prior to fecundation.

Archaic, Archaical (ärˈkāˈik, ärˈkāˈik-al), a. [Gr. archaïkos, old-fashioned, from archaios, ancient.] Characterized by archaism; obsolete; antiquated.

A person familiar with the dialect of certain portions of Massachusetts will not fail to recognize, in ordinary discourse, many words now noted in English vocabularies as archaic, the greater part of which were in common use about the time of the King James translation of the Bible. Shakspere stands less in need of a glossary to most New Englanders than to many a native of the old country. J. R. Lowell.

Archaiology (ärˈkā-olˈo-ji), n. Same as Archæology.

Archaism (ärˈkā-izm), n. [Fr. archaïsme, from Gr. archaios, ancient, from archē, beginning.] 1. An ancient or obsolete word, expression, or idiom.—2. Antiquity of style or use; obsoleteness. [Rare.]

A select vocabulary corresponding (in point of archaism and remoteness from ordinary use) to our Scriptural vocabulary. De Quincey.

Archall (ärˈkal), n. Same as Archil (which see).

Archangel (ärk-ānˈjel), n. 1. An angel of the highest order; an angel occupying the eighth rank in the celestial hierarchy.—2. A name common to plants of the genus Lamium; also applied to Archangelica officinalis.

Archangelic (ärk-an-jelˈik), a. Of or pertaining to archangels. 'Archangelic pomps.' E. B. Browning.

Archangelica (ärk-an-jelˈi-ka), n. A genus of umbelliferous plants. A. officinalis is pungent and agreeably aromatic, and the candied stalks are stomachic. It is chiefly used in the manufacture of gin. The seeds and leaves are employed by country people as medicines from their supposed virtues as stimulants and tonics.

Archapostate (ärch-a-posˈtāt), n. A chief apostate.

Archapostle (ärch-a-posˈl), n. A chief apostle.

Archarchitect (ärch-ärˈki-tekt), n. The supreme architect.

I'll ne'er believe that the Archarchitect
With all these fires the heavenly arches decked
Only for show. Sylvester, Du Bartas.

Arch-band (ärchˈband), n. A name given by tradesmen to that portion of an arch or rib seen below the general surface of vaulting.

Archbishop (ärch-bishˈup), n. A chief bishop; a church dignitary of the first class; a metropolitan bishop who superintends the conduct of the suffragan bishops in his province, and also exercises episcopal authority in his own diocese. There are in England two archbishops—the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Archbishop of York; the former is primate of all England and metropolitan, and has precedence over all the clergy of the English Church; the latter is primate of England, and ranks next to the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Archbishopric (ärch-bishˈup-rik), n. The jurisdiction or place of an archbishop; the province over which an archbishop exercises authority. There are in England two archbishoprics—Canterbury and York—called the Archiepiscopal Sees; the former is the metropolitan see of all England.

Arch-board (ärchˈbōrd), n. In ship-building, a plank placed along a ship's stern, and immediately under the knuckles of the stern-timbers. On this board the ship's name is sometimes painted.

Archbotcher (ärch-boch'ér), n. A chief botcher or mender. 'Archbotcher of a psalm or prayer.' Bp. Corbet. [Ironical.]

Arch-brick (ärch'brik), n. A wedge-shaped brick employed in building arches.

Archbutler (ärch-but'lér), n. A chief butler; formerly, an officer of the old German Empire who presented the cup to the emperor on solemn occasions. The office belonged to the King of Bohemia.

Arch-buttress (ärch-but'tres), n. In arch. a flying-buttress (which see).

Archchamberlain (ärch-chām'bėr-lin), n. A chief chamberlain; formerly, an officer of the old German Empire, whose office was similar to that of the great chamberlain in England. This office belonged to the Elector of Brandenburg.

Archchancellor (ärch-chan'sel-lėr), n. A chief chancellor; formerly, an officer in the old German Empire who presided over the secretaries of the court. Under the first races of French kings, when Germany and Italy belonged to them, three archchancellors were appointed; and this institution gave rise to the three archchancellors formerly in Germany, who were the Archbishops of Mentz, of Cologne, and of Treves.

Archchanter (ärch-chant'ér), n. The chief chanter or president of the chanters of a church.

Archchemic (ärch-kem'ik), a. Of supreme chemical powers. 'The archchemic sun.' Milton.

Archcount (ärch-kount'), n. A chief count; a title formerly given to the Count of Flanders on account of his great riches and power.

Archdapifer (ärch-dap'i-fėr), n. [Arch, chief, and L. dapifer, a food-bearer, from daps, meat or a feast, and fero, to carry.] An officer in the old German Empire, whose office was, at the coronation of the emperor, to carry the first dish of meat to table on horseback.

Archdeacon (ärch-dē'kn), n. In England, an ecclesiastical dignitary, next in rank below a bishop, who has jurisdiction either over a part of or over the whole diocese. He is usually appointed by the bishop, and has an authority originally derived from the bishop, but now independent of him.

Archdeaconate (ärch-dē'kn-āt), n. The district over which an archdeacon has jurisdiction; an archdeaconry.

Archdeaconry (ärch-dē'kn-ri), n. The office, jurisdiction, or residence of an archdeacon. In England every diocese is divided into archdeaconries, and each archdeaconry into rural deaneries, and each deanery into parishes.

Archdeaconship (ärch-dē'kn-ship), n. The office of an archdeacon.

Archdesigner (ärch-dē-sīn'ér), n. A chief designer.

> It is a little hard when one, probably numbered among the archdesigners against us, thinks fit to come and charge us with the want of reality in the debate. Gladstone.

Archdiocese (ärch-dī'o-sēs), n. The diocese of an archbishop.

Archdruid (ärch-drų'id), n. A chief druid, or pontiff of the ancient druids.

Archducal (ärch-dūk'al), a. Pertaining to an archduke.

> In the Austrian assembly of states Vienna has as many votes as all the other archducal towns together. Brougham.

Archduchess (ärch-duch'es), n. The wife of an archduke; a princess of the reigning families of Russia and Austria.

Archduchy (ärch-duch'i), n. The territory or rank of an archduke or archduchess.

Archduke (ärch-dūk'), n. A prince belonging to the reigning family of Austria-Hungary.

Archdukedom (ärch-dūk'dum), n. The territory or dignity of an archduke or archduchess; archduchy.

Archeal† (ärkē'al), a. 1. Pertaining to the archeus or internal efficient cause of all things; as, archeal ideas.—2. Caused by the archeus; as, archeal diseases. See ARCHEUS.

Archebiosis (ärkē-bī'o-sis), n. [Gr. archē, beginning, and bios, life.] The origination of living matter from not living; abiogenesis (which see).

Arched (ärcht), p. and a. 1. Made with an arch or curve; covered with an arch; having the form of an arch. 'His arched brows.' Shak.—2. In her. a term applied to an ordinary, both sides of which are bowed alike in the form of an arch. Called also Archy.—Arched double, having two arches or bends.

Archediacre,† n. An archdeacon. Chaucer.

Archegonium, Archegone (ärkegō'ni-um, ärkegōn), n. [Gr. archē, beginning, and gonos, offspring.] The pistillidium or female organ of cryptogamic plants, having the same function as the pistil in the flowering plants. It is a cellular sac, containing at the bottom a cell, analogous to the embryo-sac of phænogamous plants, which is impregnated by the spermatozooids. From this after fertilization the plant is produced.

Archegony (ärkeg'o-ni), n. [See ARCHEGONIUM.] The doctrine of the origin of life; specifically, the doctrine of spontaneous generation; archebiosis; abiogenesis.

> He (Haeckel) considers that, though the doctrine of spontaneous generation (or archegony) has not been proved, it is quite possible, and even probable, the arguments against it resting on merely negative results. Scotsman newspaper.

Archegosaurus (ärkē-gō-sạ''rus), n. [Gr. archēgos, primeval, and sauros, a lizard.] A fossil reptile of the carboniferous era, having a near alliance to the proteus, lepidosiren, and other perennibranchiate reptiles of the present day.

Archelogy (ärkel'o-ji), n. [Gr. archē, beginning, first principle, and logos, discourse.] The science of, or a treatise on first principles.

> Archelogy treats of principles, and should not be confounded with archæology, which treats of antiquities. Fleming.

Archemy† (ärke-mi), n. An alchemical term for the transmutation of the imperfect metals into the more perfect.

Archencephala (ärken-sef'a-la), n. pl. [Gr. archē, rule, dominion, and enkephalos, brain.] The highest of the primary sub-classes into which Owen has subdivided the mammals in accordance with the structure of the brain, distinguished by the enormous vertical and posterior development of the cerebral over the cerebellar lobes, the former completely overlapping the latter as well as the olfactory lobes. In this sub-class the number of convolutions attains its maximum, and there is a corpus callosum. It includes the solitary order, family, genus, and species, Man.

Archenemy (ärch-en'ē-mi), n. A principal enemy; specifically, Satan, the grand adversary of mankind.

Archeology (ärkē-ol'o-ji), n. Same as Archæology.

Archer (ärch'ér), n. [Fr. archer, from arc, L. arcus, a bow. See ARCH.] 1. One who uses a bow; one who is skilled in the use of the bow and arrow; a bowman.—2. The archer-fish (which see).

Archeress (ärch'ér-es), n. A female archer. 'She, therefore, glorious archeress of heaven.' Cowper.

Archer-fish (ärch'ér-fish), n. A name given to the Toxotes jaculator, a scaly-finned, acanthopterygian fish, about 6 inches long, inhabiting the seas around Java, which has the faculty of shooting drops of water to the distance of 3 or 4 feet, with sure aim, at insects, thereby causing them to fall into the water, when it seizes and devours them. The soft, and even the spiny portion of their dorsal fins, are so covered with scales as to be scarcely distinguishable from the rest of their body. Called also Darter-fish.

Archer-fish (Toxotes jaculator).

Archery (ärch'ér-i), n. 1. The use of the bow and arrow; the practice, art, or skill of archers; the art of shooting with a bow and arrow.—2. Archers collectively.

> The monarch saw the gambols flag,
> And bade let loose a gallant stag, . . .
> That venison free, and Bordeaux wine,
> Might serve the archery to dine.
> Sir W. Scott.

3. In old law, a service of keeping a bow for the lord's use, in the defence of his castle.

Arches Court, Court of Arches, n. An English ecclesiastical court, the chief and most ancient consistory court, belonging to the archbishopric of Canterbury, for the debating of spiritual causes. It is so called from the church in London, known as St. Mary le Bow (de arcubus), where it was formerly held. The jurisdiction of this court extends over the province of Canterbury. The judge is called the dean of arches.

Archetypal (ärkē-tīp-al), a. Of or pertaining to an archetype; constituting a model or pattern; original. 'One archetypal mind.' Cudworth.

> Among Platonists the archetypal world is the world as it existed in the idea of God before the creation. Goodrich.

Archetype (ärkē-tīp), n. [Gr. archetypon—archē, beginning, and typos, form.] 1. A model or first form; the original pattern or model after which a thing is made, or to which it corresponds.

> In the philosophy of Locke the archetypes of our ideas are the things really existing out of us. Fleming.
> Then it was that the House of Commons, the archetype of all the representative assemblies which now meet, either in the Old or the New World, held its first sittings. Macaulay.

2. In coining, the standard weight by which others are adjusted.—3. In compar. anat. that ideal, original, or fundamental pattern on which a natural group of animals or system of organs is assumed to have been constructed; as, the vertebral archetype.

Archetype-skeleton (ärkē-tīp-skel'ē-ton), n. In anat. an ideal skeleton, constructed by Professor Owen, and to which the endoskeletons of all the Vertebrata are referred as modifications. In this skeleton is arranged the succession of vertebral segments of those animals, together with their various processes, foramina, and appendages.

Archetypical (ärkē-tip'ik-al), a. Relating to an archetype; archetypal.

Archeus (ärkē'us), n. Same as Archæus.

Archiater (ärki-ā'tér), n. [Gr. archos, chief, and iatros, physician.] Chief physician; a term applied on the continent of Europe to the first or body physician of princes, and to the first physician of some cities; specifically, in Russia, the first imperial physician.

Archical† (ärkik-al), a. Chief; primary. 'Principality and archical rule.' Hallywell.

Archidiaconal (ärki-dī-ak''on-al), a. Pertaining to an archdeacon; as, an archidiaconal visitation.

Archiepiscopacy (ärki-ē-pis''kō-pa-sī), n. The state or dignity of an archbishop.

Archiepiscopal (ärki-ē-pis'kō-pal), a. Belonging to an archbishop; as, Canterbury is an archiepiscopal see.

Archiepiscopality (ärki-ē-pis'kō-pal''i-ti), n. The dignity or state of an archbishop; archiepiscopacy. Fuller.

Archiepiscopate (ärki-ē-pis''kō-pāt), n. The office or jurisdiction of an archbishop; an archbishopric.

Archierey (ärki-kī'e-ri), n. [Rus. archiereï, Gr. archiereus, a high-priest, from prefix archi, arch, and hiereus, a priest.] A collective term for the higher order of ecclesiastics in the Greek Church in Russia, including metropolitans, archbishops, and bishops. Pinkerton.

Archigrapher† (ärkig'ra-fėr), n. [Gr. archos, chief, and graphō, to write.] A chief secretary.

Archil (ärkil), n. [Fr. orseille, lorchel—after Rucellai or Oricellari, who about 1300 first employed the lichen for dyeing purposes.] A rich violet, mauve, or purple colouring matter obtained from certain lichens, especially the Roccella tinctoria and R. fuciformis, growing on rocks in the Canary and Cape de Verd Islands. The lichen is bruised between stones and moistened with putrid urine, mixed with quicklime or other alkaline liquor. It first takes a purplish red colour, and then turns to violet. In the first state it is called archil; and in the second, lacmus or litmus. Dyers rarely use archil by itself, on account of its dearness and the perishableness of its beauty. They employ it to give a bloom to other colours, as pinks, Roccella tinctoria, from which archil is obtained.

blues, and blacks, but this bloom soon decays. Archil is used for colouring the spirits of thermometers, and also by chemists as a test for detecting the presence of an acid. Written also Orchal, Orchil, &c.

Archilochian (är-ki-lō'ki-an), a. Pertaining to Archilochus, the Greek poet. In anc. pros. the term is used to denote the four metrical combinations which he invented. There are three dactylic Archilochian distichs, and one iambic Archilochian distich.

Archilowe (ärch'i-lou), n. [D. her, again, and gelag, shot or share of expenditure at an inn. Comp. Sc. lawing.] The return which one who has been treated in an inn or tavern sometimes reckons himself bound in honour to make to the company. When he calls for his bottle he is said to give his archilowe. Also written Archilagh. [Scotch.]

I propose that this good little gentleman that seems sair forfoughten, as I may say, in this tuilyie, shall send for a tass of brandy, and I'll pay for another by way of archilowe. Sir W. Scott.

Archilute (ärch'i-lūt), n. Same as Archlute.

Archimagus (är-ki-mā'gus), n. The high-priest of the Persian Magi, or worshippers of fire.

Greek Archimandrite, from an original sketch.

Archimandrite (är-ki-man'drīt), n. [Gr. archimandritēs, from archi-, chief, and mandra, a monastery.] In the Greek Ch. an abbot or abbot-general, who has the superintendence of many abbots and convents. In Sicily the abbots are called archimandrites because their convents were originally of Greek institution, and conform to the rules of St. Basil. The abbots-general of the United Greeks in Poland, Galicia, Transylvania, Hungary, and Venice also bear the title.

Archimedean (är'ki-mē-dē"an), a. Pertaining to Archimedes, or to the screw invented by him.—Archimedean propeller, a propeller consisting of a continuous spiral vane on a hollow core running lengthwise of the vessel. It is an amplification and extension of the screw.—Archimedean screw, an instrument said to have been invented by Archimedes to raise water to a small height. It is formed by winding a flexible tube round a cylinder in the form of a screw. When the screw is placed in an inclined position, as in the accompanying wood-cut, and the lower end immersed in water, by causing the screw to revolve the water is raised to the upper end. Whatever quantity of water first enters the screw immediately descends by its own weight to the lowest point of the spiral; but this point being always shifted higher up by the revolution of the screw, water or other fluid may thus be raised to a limited height. Called also Water Screw and Spiral Pump.—Archimedean principle, or principle of Archimedes, (a) the principle of the equilibrium of the lever, namely, that a lever loaded with two weights, on opposite sides of the fulcrum, is in equilibrium when the weights are inversely proportional to the length of the arms at whose ends they hang, and that the pressure on the fulcrum of the lever is then exactly equal to the sum of the two weights. (b) The hydrostatical principle, also discovered by Archimedes, that a body immersed in a fluid loses exactly as much of its weight as is equal to the weight of the water it displaces.

Arching (ärch'ing), n. The arched portion of a structure.

Archipelagic (är'ki-pe-laj"ik), a. Relating to an archipelago.

Archipelago (är-ki-pel'a-gō), n. pl. Archipelagos (är-ki-pel'a-gōz). [Gr. archos, chief, and pelagos, the sea.] Originally and specifically, the sea which separates Europe from Asia, otherwise called the Egean Sea, studded with a number of small islands: in a general sense, any body of water interspersed with many islands; the group of islands themselves.

Architect (är'ki-tekt), n. [Fr. architecte, L. architectus, from Gr. prefix archi, chief, and tektōn, a workman.] 1. A person skilled in the art of building; one who understands architecture, or makes it his occupation to form plans and designs of buildings, and superintend the artificers employed.—2. A contriver; a former or maker. 'Chief architect and plotter of these woes.' Shak.

Architective (är-ki-tek'tiv), a. Used in building; proper for building.

Architectonic, Architectonical (är'ki-tek-ton"ik, är'ki-tek-ton"ik-al), a. [Gr. architektōn, an architect.] Pertaining to or skilled in architecture; evincing skill in designing or constructing. 'Architectonic wisdom.' Boyle. 'Geometrical and architectonical artists.' Sir T. Browne.

Architectonics (är'ki-tek-ton"iks), n. The science of architecture.

Architector† (är'ki-tek-tėr), n. An architect.

Architectress (är'ki-tek-tres), n. A female architect. Wotton. [Rare.]

Architectural (är-ki-tek'tūr-al), a. Pertaining to architecture or the art of building; according to the rules of architecture.

Architecture (är'ki-tek-tūr), n. [L. architectura, from architectus. See ARCHITECT.] 1. The art or science of building or constructing; workmanship; construction.

The formation of the first earth being a piece of divine architecture, ascribed to a particular providence. Burnet.

Specifically—2. The art of constructing houses, bridges, and other buildings for the purposes of civil life—often called civil architecture; or, in a still more limited sense, the principles of fine art applied to building; that branch of the fine arts which has for its object the production of edifices pleasing to a cultivated and artistic taste, gratifying the feeling of the beautiful. The leading styles of architecture have been characterized as Egyptian, Indian, Greek, Gothic, &c. An admixture of styles, chiefly of the Classic with Gothic, gave rise in the middle ages to the Byzantine, Romanesque, and Norman, and at a later date to the Renaissance, &c. The Greek style was divided into three orders, mainly with reference to the proportions and ornamentation of its columns, named respectively the Doric, Ionic, and Corinthian; and to these the Romans added the Tuscan and Composite. Each style has various stages, indicative generally of the age or the country in which each modification took its rise. Thus the Gothic has been divided into the Norman, the Early English, Decorated, Flamboyant, &c.—Military architecture, the art of fortification.—Naval architecture, the art of building ships and other structures useful in naval warfare.

Architrave (är'ki-trāv), n. [Fr. It. architrave—prefix archi, chief, and It. trave, from L. trabs, a beam.] In arch. (a) the lower division of an entablature, or that part which rests immediately on the column. See COLUMN. (b) The ornamental moulding running round the exterior curve of an arch. (c) The moulded enrichment on the faces of the jambs and lintel of a door, window, or other opening.—Architrave cornice, an entablature consisting of an architrave and cornice only, the frieze being omitted.

Archiva† (är-kī'va), n. pl. Archives.

The Christians were able to make good what they asserted by appealing to those records kept in the Roman archiva. Dr. H. More.

Archival (är'kīv-al or är'ki-val), a. Pertaining to archives or records; contained in records.

Archive (är'kīv), n. [L.L. archivum, a place for keeping public records, hence applied to the records themselves, from Gr. archeion, a government building, from archē, rule, government.] 1. A record or document preserved in evidence of something; almost always in plural and signifying documents or records relating to the rights, privileges, claims, treaties, constitutions, &c., of a family, corporation, community, city, or kingdom. 'A most unpleasant archive or register.' Holland.—2.† The chamber or apartment where such documents are kept. SYN. Registers, records, chronicles, muniments.

Arch-wife (ärch-wif'), n. A woman of strong masculine character; a hardy masculine woman disposed to rule her husband.

Ye archewyves, stondeth at defence,
Sin ye be strong as is a greet camaille (camel);
Ne suffereth nat that men yow don offence
Chaucer.

Archwise (ärch'wīz), adv. In the form of an arch. 'In the fashion of a bow bent archwise.' Ayliffe.

Archy (ärch'i), a. 1. Resembling or having arches; arching.

Beneath the black and archy brows shined forth the bright lamps of her eyes.
Partheneia Sacra, 1633.

2. In her. same as Arched, 2.

Arc-indicator (ärk'in-di-kāt-ėr), n. In bot. an apparatus for measuring the development of an internode, that is, the space intervening between two nodes, or parts of the stem from which leaves arise. Sachs.

Arcitenent† (ar-sit'e-nent), a. [L. arcus, a bow, and tenens, holding, teneo, to hold.] Carrying a bow.

Arcograph (ärk'ō-graf), n. [L. arcus, a bow, and Gr. graphō, to describe.] An instrument for drawing a circular arc without the use of a central point; a cyclograph.

Arctation (ärk-tā'shon), n. [L. arctus, tight.] Narrowness or constriction in any sense; arctitude; in med. unnatural contraction of any natural opening, as of the anus; constipation from inflammation.

Arctic (ärk'tik), a. [L. arcticus; Gr. arktikos, from arctos, a bear, the northern constellation Ursa Major.] Pertaining to the northern constellations called the Great and Little Bears; northern; as, the arctic pole, circle, region, or sea. The arctic circle is a lesser circle parallel to the equator, 23° 28′ from the north pole. This and the antarctic circle are called the polar circles, and within these lie the frigid zones. — Arctic fox, a small species of fox (Canis lagopus), family Canidæ, celebrated for the beauty and fineness of its fur, which is a valuable article of commerce. It is gray in summer and white in winter.

Arctic (ärk'tik), n. The Arctic Ocean.

Arctictis (ärk-tik'tis), n. [Gr. arktos, a bear, and iktis, a ferret or marten.] A genus of ursine carnivores, of which the best-known species is A. binturong (the binturong of Borneo, Sumatra, &c.), of the size of a large cat. It is chiefly distinguished by its strong tail, which aids it in climbing trees.

Arctiidæ (ärk-tī'i-dē), n. pl. [Gr. arktos, a bear.] A family of lepidopterous insects belonging to the section Heterocera; the tiger-moths. The types of the family are distinguished by their larvæ being very thickly clothed with long hairs, whence they have obtained the name of woolly bears. They feed upon the external parts of plants, and inclose themselves in cocoons when about to undergo their transformations.

Arctitude (ärk'ti-tūd), n. Same as Arctation.

Arctium (ärk'shi-um), n. [Gr. arkteion, from arctos, a bear, from its rough prickly flowers, called burs.] A genus of plants of the nat. order Compositæ. There are several species which are troublesome weeds. The roots of A. Lappa (the burdock) were supposed to be aperient, diuretic, and sudorific. They have been used as a substitute for sarsaparilla. In Japan the burdock is used as a vegetable, and is called Gobo.

Arctomys (ärk'to-mis), n. [Gr. arktos, a bear, and mys, a rat.] A genus of rodent animals; the marmots. See MARMOT.

Arctostaphylos (ärk-to-staf'i-los), n. [Gr. arktos, a bear, and staphylē, a bunch of grapes.] A genus of ericaceous plants nearly related to Arbutus, but consisting of two species of small procumbent shrubs, both natives of Britain. See BEARBERRY.

Arctotis (ärk-tō'tis), n. [Gr. arktos, a bear, and ous, ōtos, an ear, from the shaggy fruit.] A genus of composite plants, natives of the Cape of Good Hope. Several species are favourites in the greenhouse from their heads of showy orange-coloured flowers.

Arcturus (ärk-tū'rus), n. [Gr. arktos, a bear, and oura, tail.] A fixed star of the first magnitude in the constellation of Boötes, and thought by some to be the nearest to our system of any of the fixed stars. It is one of the stars observed to have a proper motion.

Arcuate (ärk'ū-āt), a. [L. arcuatus, bent like a bow, from arcus, a bow.] Bent or curved in the form of a bow. 'Oblique and arcuate lines.' Bacon.

Arcuatile† (ärk'ū-a-tīl), a. Bent or curved.

Arcuation (ärk-ū-ā'shon), n. 1. The act of bending; incurvation; the state of being bent; curvity; crookedness.—2. A method of raising trees by layers; that is, by bending branches to the ground and covering the small shoots with earth; layering (which see).

Arcuature† (ärk'ū-a-tūr), n. The curvature of an arch. Bailey.

Arcubalist (ärk'ū-bal-ist), n. [L. arcus, a bow, and balista, an engine for throwing stones. See ARBALIST.] A cross-bow; an arbalist (which see).

It is an historical fact that Richard was killed by the French from the shot of an arcubalist.
T. Warton.

Arcubalister (ärk'ū-bal-ist''ėr), n. A cross-bowman; one who used the arcubalist.

King John was espied by a very good arcubalister, who said that he would soon despatch the cruel tyrant. Camden.

Arcubus (ärk'ū-bus), n. Same as Arquebuse.

Arcus senilis (ark'us sen-ī'lis), n. [L.] The bow of old age; an opacity round the margin of the cornea occurring in advanced age.

-Ard. The termination of many English words. (a) It is the adjective hard, G. hart, A. Sax. heard, as in O.H.G. proper names; as, Adel*hart*, very noble; Regin*hart*, Rein*hart*, E. Reyn*ard*, strong in counsel; Bern*hart*, E. Bern*ard*, strong like a bear; Got*hart*, E. God*dard*, strong through God. (b) It appears to be a Teutonic suffix, signifying kind, sort, nature, mode of life (G. art, kind, species, nature, D. aard), and has the force of an augmentative, meaning one who naturally is, or who habitually performs, what is implied in the root; as, brag*gart* (brag*gard*), do*tard*, drunk*ard*, dull*ard*, slug*gard*, wiz*ard*. In some of these or similar words it is probably a modified form of the English noun termination -er, there being a tendency in Teutonic tongues to add a final d or t after a liquid for the sake of euphony; thus vulgar E. drownd for drown, swownd for swoon, scholard for scholar, Prov. E. and Sc. misert and orphant for miser and orphan. In a few words -ard appears to have a passive force; as, lop*pard*, poll*ard*, a tree that is lopped, polled.

Ardassine (är-das'sin), n. [Fr., from ardasse; said to be from the district of Ardeshir, in Persia.] A very fine sort of Persian silk, the finest used in the looms of France.

Ardea (är'dē-a), n. [L., a heron.] A genus of grallatorial or wading birds, family Ardeidæ, consisting of the different species of herons, of which our common heron (A. cinerea) is the type. See ARDEIDÆ, HERON.

Ardeb (är'deb), n. An Egyptian weight and measure equivalent to 226 lbs., or to about 40½ gallons.

Argonaut (är'gō-nąt), n. [Gr. Argō, Jason's ship, and nautēs, a sailor.] 1. One of the persons who, according to the Old Greek legend, sailed to Colchis with Jason, in the ship Argo, in quest of the golden fleece.—2. One of the molluscous animals belonging to the genus Argonauta, family Argonautidæ, and class Cephalopoda or cuttle-fishes, more especially the Argonauta Argo (common argonaut, paper-nautilus, or paper-sailor of the Mediterranean). The genus Argonauta belongs to the dibranchiate or two-gilled cuttle-fishes, and is distinguished by the females possessing a single-chambered external shell, which is not a true molluscous shell, however, not being secreted by the mantle or pallium, but by two of the arms which are developed to form membranous expansions, and ordinarily folded round it so as to protect and cover it, the shell not being organically connected with the body of the animal. The males have no shell, and are of much smaller size than the females. The shell is fragile, translucent, and boat-like in shape; it serves as the receptacle of the ova or eggs of the female, which sits in it with the respiratory tube or 'funnel' turned towards the carina or 'keel.' This famed mollusc swims only by ejecting water from its funnel, and it can crawl in a reversed position, carrying its shell over its back like a snail. The account of its floating on the surface of the sea, with its sail-shaped arms extended to catch the breeze, and with the six other arms as oars, is a mere poetic fable. The argonaut, or paper-nautilus, must be carefully distinguished from the pearly-nautilus or nautilus proper (Nautilus Pompilius), which belongs to a different division of the cuttle-fishes, namely, the tetrabranchiate or four-gilled.

Argonaut (Argonauta Argo).

Argonauta (är-gō-nạ'ta), n. A genus of cuttle-fishes to which the argonauts belong. See ARGONAUT.

Argonautic (är-gō-nạ'tik), a. Pertaining to the Argonauts, or to their voyage to Colchis; as, the Argonautic story.

Argonautidæ (är-gō-nạ'ti-dē), n. pl. The family of cephalopodous molluscs, order Tetrabranchiata, which contains the argonaut, paper-sailor, or paper-nautilus. See ARGONAUT.

Argo-Navis (är'gō-nā'vis), n. In astron. the southern constellation of the Ship, containing 9 clusters, 3 nebulæ, 13 double and 540 single stars, of which about 64 are visible.

Argosy (är'gō-si), n. [Among the older forms of the word are ragosie, ragusye, the origin being the famous seaport Ragusa; lit. a ship of Ragusa.] A large merchantman or vessel of war. [Poetical.]

There where your argosies with portly sail,
Like signiors and rich burghers on the flood, . . .
Do over-peer the petty traffickers. Shak.

Argot (är'got or är-gō), n. [Fr.] The conventional slang of thieves and vagabonds, invented for the purpose of disguise and concealment; cant; slang.

Argot is formed . . . by the adoption of foreign words, by the absolute suppression of grammar, by grotesque tropes, wild catachresis, and allegorical metonymy. Farrar.

Arguable (är'gū-a-bl), a. Capable of being argued; admitting argument.

Argue (är'gū), v.i. pret. & pp. argued; ppr. arguing. [L. arguo, to show, argue, to make clear.] 1. To invent and offer reasons to support or overthrow a proposition, opinion, or measure; to use arguments; to reason; as, A argues in favour of a measure, B argues against it.

Yet I argue not Against Heaven's hand or will, nor bate a jot
Of heart or hope. Milton.

2. To contend in argument; to dispute: followed by with; as, you may argue with your friend a week without convincing him.

For even though vanquished, he could argue still.
Goldsmith.

—Argue, Dispute, Debate. Argue is to defend one's self, or to exhibit reasons or proofs in favour of some assertion or principle. Dispute is to call in question or deny the statements or arguments of an opposing party. Debate is to interchange arguments in a somewhat formal manner, as in a public assembly.—SYN. To reason, evince, discuss, debate, expostulate, remonstrate.

Argue (är'gū), v.t. 1. To debate or discuss; to treat by reasoning; as, the counsel argued the cause before the supreme court; the cause was well argued.—2. To prove or evince; to manifest by inference or deduction, or to show reasons for; as, the order visible in the universe argues a divine cause.

These were words
As meted by the measure of himself
Arguing boundless forbearance. Tennyson.

3. To persuade by argument or reasons.

It is a sort of poetical logic which I would make use of to argue you into a protection of this play.
Congreve.

Argument (är'gū-ment), n. [L. argumentum, proof, evidence, theme, subject-matter, from arguo, to argue.] 1.† Proof; evidence.

There is . . . no more palpable argument of the existence of a Deity. Ray.

2. The subject of a discourse or writing; an abstract or summary of a book or section of a book.

The abstract or argument of the piece is shortly as follows. Jeffrey.

3.† A theme or subject for talk.

It would be argument for a week, laughter for a month, and a good jest for ever. Shak.

4. A reason offered for or against a proposition, opinion, or measure; a reason offered in proof to induce belief or convince the mind: followed by for or against; as, he adduced many arguments against the proceeding.—5. A debate, controversy, or discussion; a process of reasoning; as, an argument was laid before the court, in which argument all the reasons were urged.—6.† Matter for question or controversy; business in hand; something to make one take action. 'And sheathed their swords for lack of argument.' Shak.—7. In logic, the middle term of a syllogism.—8. In math. the independent variable upon whose value that of a function depends.—9. In astron. the angle or quantity on which a series of numbers in a table depends. If, for example, a table of the sun's declination were formed corresponding to every degree, &c., of longitude, so that, the longitude being known, the declination might be found opposite to it, then the longitude would be called the argument of the declination.

Argument† (är'gū-ment), v.i. To reason; to discourse. Gower.

Argumentable (är'gū-ment-a-bl), a. Admitting of argument; capable of being argued.

Argumental (är-gū-ment'al), a. Belonging to or consisting in argument.

I am at length recovered from my argumental delirium. Johnson.

Argumentation (är'gū-men-tā"shon), n. The act of inventing or forming reasons, making inductions, drawing conclusions, and applying them to the case in discussion; the operation of inferring propositions, not known or admitted as true, from facts or principles known, admitted, or proved to be true; reasoning.

Argumentation or reasoning is that operation of the mind whereby we infer one thing, that is, one proposition, from two or more propositions premised. Watts.

Argumentative (är-gū-ment'a-tiv), a. 1. Consisting of argument; containing a process of reasoning; as, an argumentative discourse. 2. Showing reasons for.

Another thing argumentative of Providence is, &c. Ray.

Arkite (ärk'īt), a. Belonging to the ark. Bryant. [Rare.]

Arkose (är'kōs), n. [Fr.] A felspathic sandstone formed from the disintegration of granite, and composed of the materials of the parent rock embedded in a matrix of siliceous cement. It occurs as a sort of talus at the junction of granite with formations of different ages. In Sweden it is found resembling a coarse sandstone grit.

Ark-shell (ärk'shel), n. A name common to the shells of those mollusca belonging to the family Arcadæ (which see).

Arle-penny, Arles-penny (ärl'pen-ni, ärlz'-pen-ni), n. Same as Arles.

Arles (ärlz), n. pl. [Probably from L. arrha, earnest-money; comp., however, Gael. iarlas, earlas, Ir. iarlus, earnest-money, which may be the original, if not themselves borrowed.] Earnest-money given in confirmation of a bargain, contract, or agreement. The practice is now almost discontinued except in the case of hiring servants. [Scotch and North of England.]

Arm (ärm), n. [A. Sax. arm, earm, Goth. arms, Icel. armr, G. Fris. D. Dan. and Sw. arm; allied to L. armus, the shoulder where it is fitted to the shoulder-blade; Gr. armos, a fitting, from arō, to fit; Skr. ar, to bring one thing to another.] 1. The limb of the human body which extends from the shoulder to the hand. In her. the arm is variously borne as a charge upon the shield and for crest.—2. Anything formed on the type of or resembling the arm, as fore-legs of animals, the bough of a tree, the slender parts of a machine projecting from a trunk, axis, or fulcrum, as the arms of a lever; anything projecting from a main body, as a narrow inlet of waters from the sea.—3. Fig. power, might, strength; as, the secular arm. In this sense the word is often used in the Scriptures.

To whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?
Is. liii. 1.

—Daggering or stabbing arms, a practice once observed among gallants of piercing their arms with daggers so as to draw blood, which they mixed with wine and drank to the health of their mistresses. Nares.

Have I not . . . stabb'd arms, and done all the offices of protested gallantry for your sake?
Marston.

Arm† (ärm), v.t. To take by the arm; to offer the arm to; to take up in the arms.

Arm your prize;
I know you will not lose him. Beau. & Fl.

And make him with our pikes and partizans
A grave. Come, arm him. Shak.

Arm (ärm), n. [Fr. arme, a weapon, from L. arma, arms.] 1. Milit. (a) a weapon: in this sense most commonly used in the plural, and when used in the singular it is for the most part rather with reference to a particular kind of weapon than with reference to an individual piece.

We are sending an army of rifles against an army of muskets, though the Russian musket is, we believe, a superior and powerful arm.
Leader newspaper.

(b) pl. Armour; coverings for the body intended as defences against weapons of war.

Look, a prize!
Three horses and three goodly suits of arms,
And all in charge of whom? a girl: set on.
Tennyson.

(c) A branch of the military service, as cavalry or artillery; as, the enemy was strong in artillery, but we were weak in that arm. [This use is possibly in part due to a figurative use of the other word arm in the sense of a branch of anything.] Hence—2. pl. Deeds or exploits of war; war; hostility.

Arms and the man I sing. Dryden.

3. pl. Armorial bearings; the devices armorial of a community, office, or family, consisting of figures and colours borne on shields, on banners, &c., as marks of dignity and distinction, and, in the case of family and feudal arms, descending from father to son. Armorial bearings have been classed as—(1) Arms of dominion, or the national arms borne by the sovereign; (2) of pretension, quartered by a sovereign to express his claim to a foreign kingdom, as those of France borne by the kings of England till 1801; (3) of succession, or feudal arms, arms of a lordship or estate, as those of Mar quartered by the earls of Derby; (4) of family, borne by all the descendants of the first bearer; (5) of assumption, arms of a captive in war borne by his captor; thus the Prince of Wales bears the arms of Bohemia; (6) of alliance, as those of a wife which a husband impales with his own; (7) of office, as of lyon king-at-arms; (8) of community, as of corporations, sees, &c.—Canting arms, sometimes called allusive or punning arms, and in French armes parlantes, contain charges alluding to the name of the bearer; thus the arms of the family of Arundel are six swallows (hirondelles in French) argent. Armorial bearings were first employed by the Crusaders, and became hereditary in families at the close of the twelfth century. They took their rise from the knights painting their banners each with a figure or figures proper to himself, to enable him to be distinguished in battle when clad in armour.—4. In law, anything which a man takes in his hand in anger to strike or assault another.—5. pl. In bot. anything that serves as a defence to a plant, as prickles, thorns, or spines.—6. pl. In falconry, the legs of a hawk from the thigh to the foot.—Arms of precision, firearms rifled, furnished with scientifically graduated sights, accurately prepared bullets, and all appliances calculated to enable them to act with great precision, rapidity, and at much greater distances than the arms which preceded them. The Armstrong gun and Martini-Henry rifle are examples of arms of precision.—Small arms, arms that can be carried by those who use them.—A stand of arms, a complete set of arms for one soldier, consisting of a musket, bayonet, cartridge-box and belt, with a sword.—To be in arms, to be in a state of hostility, or of preparation for war.

Sir Edward Courtenay and the haughty prelate,
With many more confederates, are in arms.
Shak.

—To be under arms, to be armed and in a state of readiness for fighting.—To arms! a call to persons to take up arms for war or hostility.—To take (or take up) arms, to arm for attack or defence.—Bred to arms, educated to the profession of a soldier.

Arm (ärm), v.t. [L. armo; Fr. armer; It. armare; from L. arma, arms.] 1. To furnish or equip with weapons of offence or defence; as, to arm the militia 2. To cover or provide with whatever will add strength, force, or security; as, to arm the hilt of a sword; to arm a man-of-war with armour plates.—3. To furnish with means of defence; to prepare for resistance; to fortify.

Arm yourselves likewise with the same mind.
1 Pet. iv. 1.

There is no terror, Cassius, in your threats,
For I am armed so strong in honesty,
That they pass by me as the idle wind. Shak.

4. To fit up; to furnish with the means of action or effect; as, to arm a hook in angling; to arm a dressing in surgery.—To arm a magnet, to fit it with an armature. See ARMATURE.

Arm (ärm), v.i. To provide with arms, weapons, or means of attack or resistance; to take arms; as, the nations arm for war. 'Tis time to arm.' Shak.

Armada (är-mä'da), n. [Sp., an armed naval force.] A fleet of armed ships; a squadron. The term is usually applied to the Spanish fleet, called the Invincible Armada, consisting of 130 ships, intended to act against England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, A.D. 1588.

Armadillo (är-ma-dil'lō), n. pl. Armadillos (är-ma-dil'lōz). [Sp., dim. of armado, one who is armed, so called from its bony shell.] An edentate mammal peculiar to South America, of the genus Dasypus, family Dasypodidæ, consisting of various species. These animals, with the allied genera Chlamyphorus and Orycteropus, form a family intermediate between the sloths and ant-eaters, and are characterized by having molar teeth only. The armadillos are covered with a hard bony shell, divided into belts, composed of small separate plates like a coat of mail, flexible everywhere except on the forehead, shoulders, and haunches, where it is not movable. The belts are connected by a membrane, which enables the animal to roll itself up like a hedgehog. These animals burrow in the earth, where they lie during the daytime, seldom going abroad except at night. They are of different sizes; the largest, Dasypus gigas, being 3 feet in length without the tail, and the smallest only 10 inches. They subsist chiefly on fruits and roots; sometimes on insects and flesh. When attacked they roll themselves into a ball, presenting their armour on all sides to any assailant; but they are inoffensive, and their flesh is esteemed good food. Cuvier divides the whole genus into five small groups, which are principally distinguished from each other by the number and form of their teeth and claws.

Armado† (är-mä'dō), n. Same as Armada (which see). 'A whole armado of convicted sail.' Shak.

Armament (är'ma-ment), n. [L. armamenta, utensils, tackle, from arma, arms.] 1. A body of forces equipped for war: used of a land or naval force. 'The whole united armament of Greece.' Glover.

It was necessary for him . . . to proceed with his twenty men-of-war to the Mediterranean, while his superiors, with the rest of the armament, returned to the Channel. Macaulay.

2. The munitions of a fort or ship; the number and weight of all the guns which a ship of war carries.

Armamentary (är-ma-ment'a-ri), n. An armoury; a magazine or arsenal. Bailey. [Rare.]

Armature (är'ma-tūr), n. [L. armatura, an outfit, armour.] 1. Armour; something worn to defend the body; hence, anything serving as a defence, as the prickles and spines of plants, and horns of animals, these having been conferred on them for protection. 'Others armed with hard shells; others with prickles; others having no such armature.' Ray.

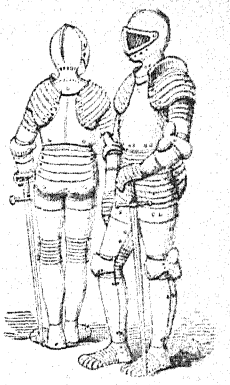
It is remarkable that man, who is endowed with reason, is born without armature. Derham.

2.† A body of armed troops. 'Ground fit for the archers and light armature.' Raleigh. 3. Iron framing or bars employed to strengthen a building, as in sustaining slender columns, holding up canopies, &c.—4. A piece of iron connecting the two poles of a magnet or electro-magnet, serving to maintain the magnetic power undiminished.

Arm-band (ärm'band), n. A piece of crooked iron attached to a rail or stone block, fixed against the walls in barrack-rooms to retain the soldiers' muskets when not in use, the butt-ends resting on the floor.

Arm-chair (ärm'chār), n. A chair with arms to support the elbows.

Armed (ärmd), p. and a. 1. Furnished with weapons of offence or defence; furnished with the means of security; fortified, in a moral sense.—2. In her. applied to beasts and birds of prey when the beaks, talons, horns, or teeth are of a different colour from the rest of the body.—3. In magnetism, furnished with an armature or a piece of iron so as to connect the poles, as a horse-shoe magnet.—4. In bot. having prickles or thorns.—Armed ship, a ship which is taken into the service of a government for a particular occasion, and armed like a ship of war.—Armed at all points, a term used for a man completely covered with armour excepting his face when his vizor is up. When it is closed he is totally sheathed, or armed cap a pie. The engraving shows two views of a complete suit of armour made for Henry VIII. when a young man.—Armed in flute. See under FLUTE.—Armed neutrality, the condition of affairs when a nation assumes a threatening position, and maintains an armed force to repel any aggression on the part of belligerent nations between which it is neutral.—Armed peace, the condition of a country which in the time of peace maintains its military establishments on a war footing, so as to be ready for war at any moment.



Armed at all points.—From Tower of London.

Armenian (är-mē'ni-an), a. Pertaining to Armenia, a country and formerly a kingdom in Asia, divided into Major and Minor. The greater Armenia is now called Turcomania.—Armenian bole, a species of clay from Armenia. See BOLE.—Armenian stone, a soft blue carbonate of copper; also a commercial name for lapis-lazuli.

Armenian (är-mē'ni-an), n. 1. A native of Armenia, or the language of the country.—2. Eccles. an adherent of the Christian Church of Armenia.

Armental,† Armentine† (är-ment'al, är-ment'in), a. [L. armentalis, from armentum, a herd.] Belonging to a drove or herd of cattle. Bailey.

Armentose † (är-ment'ōs), a. Abounding with cattle. Bailey.

Armeria (är-mē'ri-a), n. [L., a kind of pink.] A genus of plants, nat. order Plumbaginaceæ, distinguished from Statice by the hairy styles and capitate flowers; thrift or sea-pink. A. maritima, a well-known species on our shores and on the higher Scottish mountain tops, is much used for edgings in gardens.

Armet (är'met), n. [Fr.] A helmet used in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries. When worn with the beaver it was called armet-grand; when without, and supplied with a triple-barred face-guard, it was called armet-petit.

Armet-grand.

Armet-petit.

Armful (ärm'fụl), n. As much as the arms can hold; what one holds in one's arms or embrace.

'Tis not the wealth of Plutus, nor the gold
Lock't in the heart of earth, can buy away
This armful from me. Beau. & Fl.

Arm-gaunt (ärm'gạnt), a. An epithet applied to a horse by Shakspere, of disputed meaning.

So he (Antony) nodded,
And soberly did mount an arm-gaunt steed,
Who neigh'd so high that what I would have spoke
Was beastly dumb'd by him. Ant. & Cleo. i. 5.

Arm-gaunt, a word peculiar to Shakspere, of which the meaning has been much disputed. Warburton gave the interpretation best suited to the text, worn by military service. Nares.

Arm-grete, † a. As thick as a man's arm. Chaucer.

Armhole (ärm'hōl), n. 1. The cavity under the shoulder, or the arm-pit.

Tickling is most in the soles of the feet, and under the armholes, and on the sides. The cause is the thinness of the skin in these parts, joined with the rareness of being touched there. Bacon.

2. A hole for the arm in a garment.

Armiferous (är-mif'ėr-us), a. [L. arma, arms, and fero, to bear.] Bearing arms.

Armiger (är'mi-jėr), n. [L., one that bears arms—arma, arms, and gero, to carry.] 1. In times of chivalry, an armour-bearer to a knight; a squire; the second in rank of the aspirants to chivalry or knighthood.—2. In later times, one with a right to armorial bearings; an esquire. See ESQUIRE.

Armigero (är-mij'ėr-ō), n. [Dative or ablative of L. armiger. See above.] Latin equivalent of English 'esquire.'

A gentleman born, master parson; who writes himself 'Armigero,' in any bill, warrant, quittance, or obligation, 'Armigero.' Shak.

Armigerous (är-mij'ėr-us), a. [L. armiger —arma, arms, and gero, to bear.] Bearing arms. [Rare.]

They belonged to the armigerous part of the population. De Quincey.

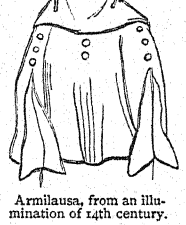
Armil (är'mil), n. [L. armilla, an armlet, from armus, the upper arm.] An armillary sphere, or a ring in such a sphere.

Armilausa (är-mi-lą'sa), n. [L. Said by Isidorus to be contracted for armi-clausa—armus, the shoulder, and clausus, shut in, from claudere, to shut.] A name of an ancient garment worn in England and on the Continent, which probably differed in shape at different times. Meyrick describes it as 'a body garment the prototype of the surcoat.' One form of it, a kind of short cloak with a hood, is represented in the accompanying cut.



Armilausa, from an illumination of 14th century.

Armilla (är-mil'la), n. [See ARMIL.] 1. An armlet; a circular or spiral ornament worn round the upper arm; also, a bracelet or ornament for the wrist.—2. In mach. an iron ring, hoop, or brace, in which the gudgeons of a wheel move.—3. In anat. a circular ligament of the wrist binding the tendons of the whole hand.

Armillary (är'mil-la-ri), a. Resembling a bracelet or armilla; consisting of rings or circles.—Armillary sphere, an arrangement of rings, all circles of one sphere, intended to show the relative positions of the principal circles of the heavens. This arrangement of rings revolves upon its axis within a horizon, divided into degrees, and movable every way upon a brass supporter. There are two sorts of armillary spheres, one with the earth and one with the sun in the centre; but as the main use of such a contrivance is to give an accurate representation of the apparent motions of the solar system, the former, known as the sphere of Ptolemy, is the one mostly used, the latter, the sphere of Copernicus, being of little practical value.

Armillate, Armillated (är'mil-lāt, är'mil-lāt-ed), n. [L. armillatus. See ARMIL.] Furnished with an armlet or bracelet. Bailey.

Armillet (är'mil-let), n. A small armilla or armlet.

Armin † (är'min), n. [A. Sax. earm, G. arm, miserable, poor.] A beggar; a mendicant. London Prodigal.

Armined (är'mind), a. In her. ermined.

Arming (ärm'ing), n. 1. The act of furnishing with arms; as, an extensive arming of the people.—2. † In her. a coat of arms.

When the Lord Beaumont, who their armings knew,
Their present peril to brave Suffolk shews. Drayton.

3. Naut. (a) a piece of tallow placed in a cavity at the lower end of a sounding lead to bring up the sand, mud, &c., of the sea-bottom. (b) pl. A kind of boarding-nettings. (c) pl. Red dress cloths formerly hung fore and aft outside the upper works on holidays: still used by foreigners. Smyth.

Arming-point (ärm'ing-point), n. A tie holding together parts of a suit of armour.

Arming-press (ärm'ing-pres), n. A screw-press with a platen heated by gas-jets, used by book-binders in applying gold-leaf to the boards of books.

Arming-sword † (ärm'ing-sōrd), n. A large two-handed sword.

A helmett of proofe shee strait did provide,
A strong arming-sword shee girt by her side.
Percy Relig.

Arminian (är-min'i-an), n. One of a sect or party of Christians, so called from James Arminius or Harmensen, a Protestant divine of Leyden, Holland, who died in 1609. They were called also Remonstrants, from their having presented a remonstrance to the States-general in 1610. They separated from the Calvinists, objecting to their views of predestination. The Arminian doctrines are—(1) Conditional election and reprobation, in opposition to absolute predestination. (2) Universal redemption, or that the atonement was made by Christ for all mankind, though none but believers can be partakers of the benefit. (3) That man, in order to exercise true faith, must be regenerated and renewed by the operation of the Holy Spirit, which is the gift of God; but that this grace is not irresistible and may be lost, so that men may relapse from a state of grace and die in their sins.

The Arminian has entangled the Calvinist, the Calvinist has entangled the Arminian in a labyrinth of contradictions. The advocate of free-will appeals to conscience and instinct—to an a priori sense of what ought in equity to be. The necessitarian falls back upon the experienced reality of facts. Froude.

Arminian (är-min'i-an), a. Pertaining to Arminius or his principles.

Arminianism (är-min'i-an-izm), n. The peculiar doctrines or tenets of the Arminians.

Armipotence (är-mip'ō-tens), n. Power in arms. Johnson.

Armipotent (är-mip'ō-tent), a. [L. armipotens, armipotentis—arma, arms, and potens, powerful.] Powerful in arms; mighty in battle.

The manifold linguist and the armipotent soldier. Shak.

Armisonant, † Armisonous † (är-mis'ō-nant, är-mis'ō-nus), a. [L. arma, arms, and sonus, sound.] Sounding or rustling in arms. Bailey.

Armistice (är'mis-tis), n. [L. arma, arms, and term. -stitium, as in solstitium (solstice), from sisto, to stand still.] A cessation of arms for a short time by convention; a truce; a temporary suspension of hostilities by agreement of the parties.

Armless (ärm'les), a. Without an arm; having lost an arm or both arms.

Armless (ärm'les), a. Destitute of weapons; defenceless. 'Spain lying armless and open.' Howell.

Armlet (ärm'let), n. [Dim. of arm.] 1. A little arm; as, an armlet of the sea.—2. A piece of protective armour for the arm.—3. An ornament for any part of the arm; a bracelet. [Though armlet and bracelet are frequently employed as convertible terms, yet the armlet worn on the upper arm should be distinguished from the bracelet, which is an ornament worn on the wrist. In the East another feature distinguishes the armlet from the bracelet, the latter being worn exclusively by women, and the former only by men, with whom it is regarded as one of the insignia of sovereign power. The most famous existing armlets are those which form part of the Persian regalia, and which formerly belonged to the Moguls.]—4. Part of the sleeve of a dress. Trollope.

Armorer, n. Same as Armourer.

Armorial (är-mō'ri-al), a. Belonging to armour, or to the arms or escutcheon of a family. 'Armorial signs of race and birth.' Wordsworth.—Armorial bearings. See ARM, a weapon, 3.

Armoric, Armorican (är-mor'ik, är-mor'ik-an), a. [Celt. ar, upon, and mor, the sea; lit. maritime.] Pertaining to the north-western part of France, formerly called Armorica, now Bretagne or Brittany. It is inhabited by a Cymric race who emigrated or fled from Britain in the fifth and sixth centuries.

Armoric (är-mor'ik), n. The language of the inhabitants of Brittany, one of the Celtic dialects which have remained to the present times: it is a member of the Cymric group, of which the Welsh, to which it is closely allied, is the only other living member.

Armorican (är-mor'ik-an), n. A native of Armorica or Brittany.

Armorist † (är'mėr-ist), n. One skilled in coat-armour or armoury. Bailey.

Armory. See ARMOURY.

Armour (är'mėr), n. [O.E. armure, O.Fr. armeure, Pr. armadura, from L. armatura, armour, from armare, to arm.] 1. Defensive arms; any covering worn to protect the body in battle; also called Harness. Metal armour was used from the tenth to the eighteenth century, and at first consisted of a tunic made of iron rings firmly sewn flat upon strong cloth or leather, and called mail. The rings were afterwards interlinked one with another so as to form a garment of themselves, called chain-mail. Great variety is found in the pattern of the armour, and in some cases small pieces of metal were used instead of rings, forming what is called scale-armour. Other parts, consisting of single pieces of metal, called plate-armour, were afterwards added, until the whole body came to be incased in a metal covering. The various forms of ring or scale armour were gradually superseded by the complete plate-armour, which continued to be worn until the introduction of firearms and field-artillery rendered it useless. Armour for distinguished personages was often embossed, engraved, and gilded in a costly manner. In the engraving are shown the various parts of a complete suit of plate-armour of the fifteenth century. In English statutes, armour is used for the whole apparatus of war, including offensive as well as defensive arms.—2. The steel or iron covering intended as a protection for a ship of war.—3. In magnetism, same as Armature. [Rare.]—Coat-armour, the escutcheon of a person or family, with its several charges and other furniture, as mantling, crest, supporters, motto, &c.—Submarine armour, a water-tight covering worn by a diver; a diving-dress.

Armour-bearer (ärʹmėr-bārʹėr), n. One who carries the armour of another.

Armourer (ärʹmėr-ėr), n. 1. A maker of armour or arms, or one who keeps them in repair; a manufacturer of instruments of war. The armourer of a ship has the charge of the arms, to see that they are in a condition fit for service. In the British army an armourer is attached to each troop of cavalry and to each company of infantry, to clean the arms.—2. One who has the care of the arms and armour of another, as of a knight, and who dresses him in armour.

Hector was moved;
He chid Andromache and struck his armourer.
Shak.

Armour-plate (arʹmėr-plāt), n. An iron or steel plate intended to be attached to the side of a ship, or the outer wall of a fort, with the view of rendering them shot-proof. See IRON-CLAD.

Armour-plated (ärʹmėr-plātʹed), a. Covered or protected by iron plates, as a vessel for naval warfare; iron-clad.

Armoury, Armory (ärʹmėr-i), n. 1. A place where arms and instruments of war are made or deposited for safe keeping.—2. Armour; arms offensive as well as defensive.

Celestial armoury, shields, helms, and spears.
Milton.

3. An armorial ensign; a crest or heraldic emblem.

Henry VII. united, by the marriage of Elizabeth of York, the white rose and the red, the armories of two very powerful families. Wotton.

4. The knowledge of coat-armour; skill in heraldry. Burke.—5. A manufactory of arms. [United States.]

Armozeen, Armozine (ärʹmō-zēnʹ), n. [Fr. armoisin, sarcenet.] A thick, plain, black silk.

Arm-pit (ärmʹpit), n. The hollow place or cavity under the shoulder.

Arm-rack (ärmʹrak), n. A frame or fitting for the stowage of arms.

Arms, n. pl. See ARM, a weapon.

Arm's-end (ärmzʹend), n. The end of the arm; a good distance off. Dryden.

Arm's-length (ärmzʹlength), n. The length of the arm.—To keep at arm's-length, figuratively, to keep off or at a distance; not to allow to come into close contact or familiarity.—To work at arm's-length, to work awkwardly or disadvantageously. Goodrich.

Arm's-reach (ärmzʹrēch), n. The reach of the arm; the distance to which the arm can reach; as, to be within arm's-reach.

Armstrong-gun (ärmʹstrong-gun), n. [After its inventor, Sir William Armstrong.] A gun of wrought-iron, constructed principally of spirally-coiled bars, and occasionally having an inner tube or core of steel, rifled with numerous shallow grooves, ranging from the smallest field-piece to pieces of the highest calibre. The projectile is coated with lead, and inserted into a chamber behind the bore. This the explosion drives forward, compressing its soft coating into the grooves, so as to give it a rotary motion, and at the same time obviate windage. The commonest form of the gun is breech-loading; but muzzle-loading Armstrong-guns have also been made, especially guns of large calibre.

Armulet (ärʹmū-lėt), n. Same as Armlet. [Rare.]

Armure (ärʹmūr), n. [Fr.] A twilled fabric used for ladies' dresses, having a cotton warp and a woollen woof.

Army (ärʹmi), a. Consisting in arms or branches; branching; spreading.

Though large the forest's monarch throws
His army shade. Burns.

Army (ärʹmi), n. [Fr. armée, an armed force or army, a participial noun from the verb armer, to arm. See ARM, a weapon.] 1. A collection or body of men armed for war, and organized in companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, or similar divisions, under proper officers. In general, an army in modern times consists of infantry and cavalry, with artillery, although the union of all is not essential to the constitution of an army.—Standing army, a body of men hired and covenanted to serve the state as soldiers, kept permanently under arms, discipline, and training, their numbers being always kept up to a certain standard.

England, protected by the sea, and rarely engaged in warlike operations on the Continent, was not yet under the necessity of employing regular troops. The sixteenth century, the seventeenth century found her still without a standing army. Macaulay.

2. A great number; a vast multitude.

The locust, . . . the cankerworm, and the caterpillar, and the palmerworm, my great army which I sent among you. Joel ii. 25.

'The noble army of martyrs.' Common Prayer.

Army-corps (ärʹmi-kōr), n. One of the largest divisions of an army in the field; a corps d'armée.

Army-list (ärʹmi-list), n. 1. A publication, issued periodically, containing a list of the officers in the army, the stations of regiments, &c.—2. Fig. the officers whose names are recorded in the list.

They ride and walk with half the army-list, . . . and yet the Miss O'Gradys are Miss O'Gradys still. Thackeray.

Arn (ärn), n. The alder-tree. [Scotch.]

Arnatto (är-natʹtō), n. See ARNOTTO.

Arnaut, Arnaout (är-nautʹ), n. [The native name.] A native of Albania; an Albanian.

Arnee, Arni (ärʹnē), n. One of the numerous Indian varieties of the buffalo (Bubalus arnī), remarkable as being the largest animal of the ox kind known. Its horns often measure from 4 to 6 feet in length, and 10 feet between the tips. It is found chiefly in the forests at the base of the Himalayas.

Arnica (ärʹni-ka), n. [By some supposed to be from Gr. arnakis, a sheep's skin; from the texture of the leaves.] A genus of plants, nat. order Compositæ. There are twelve species, one of which is found in Central Europe, A. montana (the mountain-tobacco), so called because the whole plant, especially the root, possesses a peculiar and not pleasant odour, and a nauseous taste. In every part of the plant there has been found an acrid resin and a volatile oil, and in the flowers an acrid bitter principle called arnicin. The root contains also a considerable quantity of tannin. This plant was at one time admitted into all the British pharmacopœias, and in Germany all parts of it are still used as a stimulant in low fever, while a tincture of it is much employed as an external application to wounds and bruises.

Arnicin, Arnicine (ärʹni-sin), n. An acrid bitter principle in the flowers of Arnica montana.

Arnoldist (ärʹnold-ist), n. A disciple of Arnold of Brescia, who in the twelfth century preached against the Romish Church, for which he was banished, afterwards, however, being permitted to return. By his subsequent preaching an insurrection was excited, for which he was condemned and executed.

Arnot, Arnut (ärʹnot, ärʹnut), n. [A corruption of earth-nut.] A name of the agreeably flavoured farinaceous tubers of Bunium flexuosum and B. Bulbocastanum (pig-nut or earth-nut). The first of these plants is very common on elevated and hilly grass pastures, and the second is met with in chalky fields in the south of England; pigs are fed on its tuberose roots in Hertfordshire.

Arnotto, Annotto (är-notʹtō, an-notʹtō), n. [Native South American name.] 1. Bixa Orellana, a small tree, nat. order Flacourtiaceæ, a native of tropical America. It is extremely common in Jamaica and other parts of the West Indies, and has been introduced into tropical regions of the Old World.—2. The dye or colouring matter obtained from the seeds of this plant. The seeds are covered with a reddish or reddish yellow waxy pulp, which is dissolved off in water, then dried to the consistency of putty, and made up in rolls or folded in leaves, or still more dried and made into cakes. It is employed in England as a dye for silken stuffs, or as an auxiliary in giving a deeper shade to the simple yellows. It is employed also as a colouring ingredient for butter, cheese, and chocolate. Called also Annotta, Annatto, Arnatto.

Arnut, n. See ARNOT.

Aroid (arʹoid), n. One of the Aroideæ or Araceæ.

Aroideæ (a-roidʹē-ē), n. pl. [Genus Arum.] An order of monocotyledonous plants: same as Araceæ (which see).

Aroint, v.t. See AROYNT.

Aroma (a-rōʹma), n. [Gr. arōma, spice, sweet herb.] 1. (b) A piece so adapted; a transcription; as, an orchestral arrangement of a song, an opera, and the like.

Arranger (a-rānj'ėr), n. One that arranges or puts in order.

Arrant (ar'ant), a. [Wedgwood thinks there can be no doubt that this word is really the same as E. arch, roguish, G. arg, bad, L.G. argen, arrant, 'een argen drog,' an arrant rogue; if so, arrant would seem to be a softened form of argen, with the addition of the dental to close the sound of the liquid, as in vulgar English orphant for orphan, drownd for drown, scholard for scholar. But this etymology is by no means certain, and the word may be simply another form of errant, wandering, and hence vagabond, worthless.] 1. Notorious, in a bad sense; thorough; unmitigated; downright; as, an arrant rogue or coward.

I discover an arrant laziness in my soul. Fuller.

2. † Thorough; earnest, in a good sense. 'An arrant honest woman.' Burton.

Arrantly (ar'ant-li), adv. In an arrant manner; notoriously, in a bad sense; infamously; impudently; shamefully.

Funeral tears are as arrantly hired out as mourning clokes. Sir R. L'Estrange.

See BAN. As in the case of arquebuse, this word has received a false form from a mistaken etymology.] An edict of the ancient kings of France and Germany commanding all their noblesse and vassals to assemble with their vassals and follow them to war or forfeit their estates. Written also Arierban.

Arris (ar'is), n. [O.Fr. arreste, areste, Mod. Fr. arête, the edge of a stone or piece of wood; L. arista, an ear of corn, used in later times in the sense of the vertebral column of a fish.] In arch. the line in which the two straight or curved surfaces of a body, forming an exterior angle, meet each other.

Arris-fillet (ar'is-fil-et), n. A triangular piece of wood used to raise the slates of a roof against the shaft of a chimney or a wall, to throw off the rain more effectually. Called also Tilting-fillet.

Arris-gutter (ar'is-gut-tėr), n. A wooden gutter of the form of a V, fixed to the eaves of a building.

Arrision† (a-ri'zhon), n. [L. arrisio, from arrideo, to smile upon. See ARIDE.] The act of smiling; a smiling upon. Blount.

Arris-piece (ar'is-pēs), n. One of the portions of a built mast beneath the hoops.

Arriswise (ar'is-wīz), adv. Diagonally arranged: said of tiles or slates.

Arrival (a-rī'val), n. 1. The act of arriving; a coming to or reaching a place from some distance.—2. The reaching or attainment of any object or state by effort, or in natural course; as, we trust the result will be the arrival at a just conclusion.—3. The person or thing which comes; as, Mr. and Mrs. —— were the last arrivals. 'Harangue the fresh arrivals.' Tennyson.

> The next arrivals here will gladlier build their nests. Warner.

Arrivance (a-rī'vans), n. 1.† Company coming. 'Every minute is expectancy of more arrivance.' Shak.—2. Arrival; reaching in progress. 'Its (an animal's) sudden arrivance into growth and maturitie.' Sir T. Browne.

Arrive (a-rīv'), v.i. pret. & pp. arrived; ppr. arriving. [Fr. arriver, Pr. aribar, It. arrivare, L.L. adripare, to come to shore—L. ad, to, and ripa, Fr. rive, the shore or bank of a river.] 1. To come to or reach a certain point in progress either by water or land: followed by at; as, we arrived at Havre-de-Grace.—2. To reach a point or stage by progressive advance; to attain to a certain result or state; as, to arrive at an unusual degree of excellence or wickedness; to arrive at a conclusion: in this sense sometimes with to. 'The Greek language was arrived to its full perfection.' Dryden.—3. To happen or occur. [Obsolescent.]

> He to whom this glorious death arrives. Waller.

Arrive† (a-rīv'), v.t. 1. To reach. 'Ere he arrive the happy isle.' Milton.—2. To come to; to happen to. 'Lest a worse woe arrive him.' Milton.—3. To cause to arrive; to bring. 'When Fortune . . . had arrived me in the most joyful port.' G. Cavendish.

Arrive† (a-rīv'), n. Arrival.

> How should I joy of thy arrive to hear! Drayton.

Arroba (a-rō'ba), n. [Ar. arrub, the fourth part.] 1. A weight formerly used in Spain, Portugal, Goa, Brazil, and in all Spanish America, and still used in the greater part of Central and South America. In the states of Spanish origin its weight is generally equal to 25·35 lbs. avoirdupois; in Brazil it equals 32·38 lbs.—2. A measure for wine, spirits, and oil; in Spain and Mexico equal to 3½ imperial gallons for wine and spirits, and to 2⅞ imperial gallons for oil; in Chili, Peru, and Bolivia equal to 6·7 imperial gallons for wine.

Arrode (a-rōd'), v.t. [L. arrodo, to gnaw at—ad, to, and rodo, to gnaw, whence corrode, rodent, &c.] To gnaw or nibble at.

Arrogance (a'rō-gans), n. [L. arrogantia, from arrogo, to claim—ad, and rogo, to beg or desire.] The act or quality of taking much upon one's self; that species of pride which consists in exorbitant claims of rank, dignity, estimation, or power, or which exalts the worth or importance of the person to an undue degree; pride with contempt of others; conceitedness; presumption.

> Pride hath no other glass
> To show itself, but pride; for supple knees
> Feed arrogance, and are the proud man's fees. Shak.

SYN. Assumption, haughtiness, presumption, pride, disdain, overbearing, conceit, conceitedness.

Arrogancy† (a'rō-gan-si), n. Arrogance. 'Presumptuous arroganey.' North.

Arrogant (a'rō-gant), a. 1. Making or having the disposition to make exorbitant claims of rank or estimation; giving one's self an undue degree of importance; haughty; full of assumption: applied to persons. 'Arrogant Winchester, that haughty prelate.' Shak.—2. Characterized by arrogance; proceeding from undue claims or self-importance: applied to things; as, arrogant claims.

> His (Lord Clarendon's) temper was sour, arrogant, and impatient of opposition. Macaulay.

—Magisterial, Dogmatic, Arrogant. See under MAGISTERIAL.—SYN. Proud, assuming, overbearing, presumptuous, haughty.

Arrogantly (a'rō-gant-li), adv. In an arrogant manner; with undue pride or self-importance.

Arrogantness (a'rō-gant-nes), n. Arrogance. Bailey.

Arrogate (a'rō-gāt), v.t. pret. & pp. arrogated; ppr. arrogating. [L. arrogo, arrogatum—ad, to, and rogo, to beg or desire.] To claim or demand unduly or presumptuously; to claim from vanity or false pretensions; to lay claim to in an overbearing manner; as, to arrogate power or dignity to one's self. 'To arrogate the right of deciding dogmatically.' Macaulay.

> Who, not content
> With fair equality, fraternal state,
> Will arrogate dominion undeserved
> Over his brethren. Milton.

Arrogation (a-rō-gā'shon), n. 1. The act of arrogating, or making exorbitant claims; the act of taking more than one is justly entitled to.

> Where selfness is extinguished all manner of arrogation must of necessity be extinct. Dr. H. More.

2. In Rom. law, same as Adrogation.

Arrogative† (a'rō-gāt-iv), a. Assuming or making undue claims and pretensions. Dr. H. More.

Arrondee, Arrondie (a-ron'dē), a. [See next article.] In her. applied to a cross, the arms of which are composed of sections of a circle. Written also Arondy.

Arrondissement (a-roṅ-dēs-mäṅ), n. [Fr., from arrondir, to make round—ar, from L. ad, and rond, L. rotundus, round.] In France, an administrative district forming a subdivision of a department.

Arondy (a-ron'di), a. In her. same as Arondee.

Arrope (är-rō'pā or är-rōp'), n. [Sp.] Must or new wine, especially sherry, boiled to a syrup, in order to be used as a colouring matter for other wines.

Arrose† (a-rōz'), v.t. [Fr. arroser, to sprinkle.] To bedew; to sprinkle; to wet; to drench.

> The blissful dew of heaven does arrose you. Beau. & Fl.

Arrosion† (a-rō'zhon), n. [L. arrodo, to gnaw or nibble at.] A gnawing at. Bailey.

Arrow (a'rō), n. [A. Sax. arewe, aruwe, arwe; same word as Icel. ör, pl. örvar, an arrow, and probably allied to A. Sax. earh, earu, swift, also an arrow (the swift thing), Icel. örr, swift, ready; O.G. arf, a javelin.] 1. A missile weapon, straight, slender, pointed, and barbed, to be shot with a bow.—2. Anything resembling an arrow; as, (a) in surv. a small pointed iron rod, or a stick shod with iron, to stick into the ground at the end of the chain. (b) In fort. a work placed at the salient angles of a glacis, communicating with the covert way.—Broad arrow. See BROAD-ARROW.

Arrow (a'rō), v.i. To shoot up into a long pointed stalk like an arrow.

> The West Indian planter must prevent his sugar-canes from arrowing. Simmonds' Colonial Mag.

Arrow-grass (a'rō-gras), n. A common name for plants of the genus Triglochin, and order Juncaginaceæ; also applied sometimes to the members of the order generally.

Arrow-head (a'rō-hed), n. 1. The head of an arrow.—2. A genus of aquatic plants, so called from the shape of their leaves. See SAGITTARIA.—3. A name sometimes given to a belemnite.

Arrow-headed (a'rō-hed-ed), a. Shaped like the head of an arrow.—Arrow-headed characters, alphabetical characters formed by a combination of triangular or wedge-like figures; hence called also Cuneiform

Arrow-headed Characters.

Characters. They are found inscribed on pottery, bricks, rocks, and monuments at Persepolis, Babylon, Nineveh, Susa, and other places of the East. The characters were deciphered by Grotefend, Rawlinson, Burnouf, and others.

Arrow-root (a'rō-röt), n. A starch largely used for food and for other purposes. Arrow-root proper, sometimes called Bermuda or West Indian arrow-root, is obtained from the horizontal rhizomes of several species of Maranta, and perhaps owes its name to the scales which cover the rhizome, which have some resemblance to the point of an arrow, as may be seen from the cut. Some, however, suppose that the name is due to the fact of the fresh roots being used as an application against wounds inflicted by poisoned arrows, and others say that arrow is a corruption of ara, the Indian name of the plant. The species from which arrow-root is most commonly obtained is M. arundinacea, hence called the arrow-root plant. Brazilian arrow-root, or tapioca meal, is got from the large fleshy root of Manihot utilissima, after the poisonous juice has been got rid of; East Indian arrow-root, from the large root-stocks of Curcuma angustifolia; Chinese arrow-root, from the creeping rhizomes of Nelumbium speciosum; English arrow-root, from the potato; Portland arrow-root, from the corms of Arum maculatum; and Oswego arrow-root, from Indian corn.

Arrow-stone (a'rō-stōn), n. A name sometimes given to a belemnite (which see).

Arrow-wood (a'rō-wụd), n. A Western American plant of the genus Viburnum, so named because the Indians dwelling between the Mississippi and the Pacific make their arrows of it.

Arrowy (a'rō-i), a. Resembling an arrow or arrows in any quality, as shape or rapidity and directness of motion. 'Iron sleet, of arrowy shower.' Gray. 'The lambent homage of his arrowy tongue.' Cowper.

> The carrion bird released
> Points to one cherished spot his arrowy flight.
> F. Baillie.

Arroyo (ar-roi'ō), n. [Sp.] A water-course; a rivulet. Bartlett.

Arschin (är'shin), n. See ARSHIN.

Arse (ärs), n. [A. Sax. ears, ærs, Icel. and Sw. ars, Dan. arts, D. aars, G. arsch.] The buttocks or hind part of an animal.—To hang an arse, a low expression signifying to lag behind; to be sluggish or tardy. Hudibras.

Arsenal (är'se-nal), n. [Fr. arsenal, Sp. arsenal, darsena, It. arsenale, arzenale, darsena, from Ar. dar as-sinā'a, house for working in.] A repository or magazine of arms and military stores, necessary either for assault or defence, whether for land or naval service; a public establishment where naval and military engines, or warlike equipments, are manufactured or stored, as at Woolwich.

Arsenate, Arseniate (är'sen-āt, är-sē'ni-āt), n. A salt formed by arsenic combined with any base.

Arsenic (är'sen-ik), n. [Fr. arsénic, from L. arsenicum, Gr. arsenikon, yellow orpiment, from arsēn, arsenos, male—from its powerful qualities.] 1. A chemical element of a steel-blue colour, quite brittle. It forms alloys with most of the metals. Combined with sulphur it forms orpiment and realgar, which are the yellow and red sulphides of arsenic. Orpiment is the true arsenicum of the ancients. With oxygen arsenic forms two compounds, the more important of which is arsenious oxide or arsenic trioxide (As_2O_3), which is the white arsenic, or simply arsenic, of the shops. It is usually seen in white, glassy, translucent masses, in which state it is obtained by the process of sublimation from several ores, particularly that of cobalt, and from arsenical pyrites. Of all substances arsenic is that which has most frequently occasioned death by poisoning, both by accident and design. The best remedies against the effects of arsenic on the stomach are hydrated sesquioxide of iron or gelatinous hydrate of magnesia, or a mixture of both, with copious draughts of bland liquids of a mucilaginous consistence, which serve to procure its complete ejection from the stomach. Like many other virulent poisons it is a safe and useful medicine, especially in skin diseases, when judiciously employed. It is used as a flux for glass, and also for forming pigments. It is illegal to retail arsenic without marking the word 'Poison' on the envelope and entering the purchaser's name in a book.—2. The popular name of arsenious oxide, the preparation of arsenic usually retailed in the shops. See above.

Arsenic (är-sen'ik), a. Containing arsenic; specifically, containing arsenic in smaller proportion than arsenious compounds.—Arsenic acid (H_3AsO_4), an acid formed from arsenic oxide.—Arsenic oxide (As_2O_5), a compound of oxygen and arsenic having a larger proportion of oxygen than arsenious oxide: often improperly called Arsenic Acid.

Arsenical (är-sen'ik-al), a. Of or pertaining to arsenic; containing arsenic.—Arsenical minerals, a family or class of minerals in which arsenic acts the part of the electro-negative element. They occur in primitive districts in metalliferous veins, usually associated with metallic sulphides.—Arsenical silver, an ore of silver containing arsenic.

Arsenicate (är-sen'ik-āt), v.t. To combine with arsenic.

Arsenide (är'sen-īd), n. A compound of arsenic and a metallic base.

Arsenious (är-sē'ni-us), a. Pertaining to or containing arsenic.—Arsenious acid ($HAsO_2$), an acid formed from arsenious oxide.—Arsenious oxide (As_2O_3), a compound of oxygen and arsenic having a smaller proportion of oxygen than arsenic oxide. Also called White Arsenic, and often improperly Arsenious Acid. See under ARSENIC.

Arsenite (är'sen-īt), n. A salt formed by the union of arsenious oxide with a base.

Arseniuret, Arsenuret (är-sen'ū-ret), n. A combination of arsenic with a metallic or other base. The arseniurets of cobalt, nickel, and iron are found both in veins and in beds.

Arseniuretted (är-sen'ū-ret-ed), a. Combined with arsenic so as to form an arseniuret.—Arseniuretted hydrogen (AsH_3), a gas generated by fusing arsenic with its own weight of granulated zinc, and decomposing the alloy with strong hydrochloric acid. It is colourless, has a fetid odour like that of garlic, and is frightfully poisonous when breathed.

Arsenous (är'sen-us), a. Same as Arsenious.

Arse-smart (ärs'smärt), n. A plant, Polygonum Hydropiper. Called also Smart-weed (which see).

Arseversy, †Arsie-versie† (är'se-vėr'si), adv. [Probably a corruption of Fr. à renverse, à revers.] Reverse or turned backwards; placed preposterously; upside down; topsy-turvy. 'The world goes arsie-versie.' The Passenger of Benvenuto.

Arshin, Arshine (är'shin), n. A Russian measure of 2 feet 4·242 inches.

Arsis (är'sis), n. [Gr. arsis, from airō, to elevate.] 1. In gram. the elevation of the voice, in distinction from thesis, or its depression.—2. In pros. that syllable in a measure where the ictus is put, or which is marked by a greater stress or force.—Arsis and thesis, in music, the strong position and weak position of the bar, indicated by the down-beat and up-beat in marking time.

Arsmetrike,† n. Arithmetic. Chaucer.

Arson (är'son), n. [O.Fr. arson, from L. ardeo, arsum, to burn.] In law, the malicious burning of a dwelling-house or out-house of another man, which by the common law is felony, and which, if any person is therein, is capital. Also, the wilful setting fire to any church, chapel, warehouse, mill, barn, agricultural produce, ship, coal-mine, and the like. In Scotland it is called wilful fire-raising, and in both England and Scotland it is a considerable aggravation if the burning is to defraud insurers.

Art (ärt). The second person singular indicative mood, present tense, of the verb to be. See AM, ARE.

Art (ärt), n. [L. ars, artis, art, from same root as Gr. arō, to join, to fit.] 1. The artificial disposition or modification of things to answer some special purpose; the application of knowledge or power to effect a purpose; the employment of means to accomplish some desired end: in this sense art stands opposed to nature. 'Blest with each grace of nature and of art.' Pope.

> Mr. Mill says, 'Art is but the employment of the powers of nature for an end.' Yes; but the employment is the art. That use or employment of the natural elements is precisely the function of the intelligence and the will, which differs from nature, in its proper sense, as the active differs from the passive. Edin. Rev.

2. A system of rules serving to facilitate the performance of certain actions; knowledge of such rules or skill in applying them, as in any trade, handicraft, or other special subject; as, the art of building; the art of engraving; the fine arts: in this sense art is opposed to science.

> Theorists, by an observation of particulars and by generalizing on them, attempt to construct a system of scientific propositions with respect to a certain subject; upon which system a set of rules intended for the guidance of practice may be founded. These rules form an art. Sir G. C. Lewis.

It is in this sense that we speak of the useful or mechanical arts, that is, those in which the hands and body are more concerned than the mind, as in making clothes and utensils; the fine arts (see under FINE); and the liberal, polite, or elegant arts, in which category may be classed all the branches of academical learning, as well as fine art. Formerly the circle of the sciences was confined to the seven liberal arts—grammar, rhetoric, logic, arithmetic, music, geometry, and astronomy. In this sense the term arts is still employed when we speak of the arts classes in the universities, a master of arts, &c.

> In America, literature and the elegant arts must grow up side by side with the coarser plants of daily necessity. W. Irving.

3. (a) One of the fine arts, more especially one of the imitative members of the group, and in particular painting or sculpture; as, he has adopted art as his profession.

> 'Who are the critics?' 'Men who have failed in literature and art.' Disraeli.

(b) The special skill required by those who practise these arts; artistic faculty; skill in counterfeiting nature or natural expression.

> Nothing is better founded than the famous aphorism of rhetoricians, that the perfection of art consists in concealing art. Campbell.

4. Skill, dexterity, or the power of performing certain actions acquired by experience, study, or observation; knack. 'There is art in roasting eggs.' Old adage.—5. Artfulness; cunning. 'More matter with less art.' Shak.—Art, Science. Art differs from science in being practical, while the latter is theoretical or speculative. Art in this sense is based on rules deduced from experience and designed to facilitate work or give superior excellence or precision to it. The rules of art partake less or more of the nature of directions. They are, however, ultimately based on principles; thus, the art of building is based on the principles or laws of mechanics. Science concerns itself with what is true without any necessary regard to its utility. It is knowledge co-ordinated, arranged, and systematized, and is based on or consists of laws discovered by observation, comparison, abstraction, and generalization.

> The fundamental conception of the occupation of the architect embraces the two ideas of science and art. Architecture as an art is the work of the skilled hand; as a science, it is that of the informed and cultivated brain. Edin. Rev.

SYN. Aptitude, readiness, skill, dexterity, adroitness, contrivance, profession, business, trade, calling, cunning, artifice, deceit, duplicity.

Art (ärt), n. In Scots law, instigation; abetment: used now only in the phrase art and part.

> By art is understood the mandate, instigation, or advice that may have been given towards committing the crime; part expresses the share that one takes to himself in it by the aid or assistance which he gives the criminal in the execution of it. Erskine.

Arte,† v.t. [L. artus for arctus, confined, narrow, from arceo, to shut in.] To force; to compel; to constrain.

> Love arted me to do my observance
> To his estate. Chaucer.

Arted† (ärt'ed), a. Skilled.

> It hath been counted ill for great ones to sing, or play, like an arted musician. Sylvester, Du Bartas.

Artelries,† n. pl. Artillery. Chaucer.

Artemis (är'tē-mis), n. 1. In Grecian myth. the goddess of the moon and of hunting: called by the Romans Diana. See DIANA.—2. A genus of lamellibranchiate molluscs, family Veneridæ, order Siphonida, with pallial margin sinuous.

Artemisia (är-tē-mis'i-a), n. [Gr. artemisia, wormwood.] A genus of plants of numerous species, nat. order Compositæ, comprising mugwort, southern-wood, and wormwood. Of these the A. Absinthium, or common wormwood of our cottage gardens, is well known. Several of the species are used as remedies for worms. Certain alpine species are the flavouring ingredient in the favourite French liqueur, absinthe.

Arteriac (är-tē'ri-ak), a. Same as Arterial.

Arteriac (är-tē'ri-ak), n. [Gr. arteria, the windpipe.] A medicine prescribed in diseases of the windpipe. Dunglison.

Arterial (är-tē'ri-al), a. [See ARTERY.] 1. Pertaining to an artery or the arteries; as, arterial action.—2. Contained in an artery; as, arterial blood. Arterial blood differs from venous blood, particularly by its lighter florid red colour and its greater warmth and coagulability—changes produced by the process of respiration.—Arterial navigation, navigation by means of rivers, deepened streams, canals, and artificial water-courses.

Arterialization (är-tē'ri-al-iz-ā"shon), n. The process of making arterial; the conversion of the venous into the arterial blood during its passage through the lungs, by the evolution of carbonic acid, and the absorption of oxygen from the air; hæmatosis.

Arterialize (är-tē'ri-al-iz), v.t. pret. & pp. arterialized; ppr. arterializing. To communicate, as to venous blood, the qualities of arterial blood.

Arteriography (är-tē'ri-og'ra-fi), n. [Gr. artēria, artery, and graphō, to write.] A description of the arterial system.

Arteriology (är-tē'ri-ol"o-ji), n. [Gr. artēria, artery, and logos, discourse.] A treatise or discourse on the arteries.

Arteriotomy (är-tē'ri-ot"o-mi), n. [Gr. artēria, an artery, and tomē, a cutting.] In anat. (a) the opening of an artery by the lancet or other instrument, for the purpose of letting blood. (b) That part of anatomy which treats of the dissection of the arteries.

Arteritis (är-te-rī'tis), n. [Gr. arteria, artery, and term. itis, denoting inflammation.] Inflammation of an artery or arteries.

Artery (är'tėr-i), n. [L. arteria, from Gr. artēria, the windpipe: the term was afterwards applied to the arteries proper, which, since they were commonly found void of blood after death, were supposed to be air-ducts, and to inclose the vital spirit.] 1.† The trachea or windpipe.

> Under the artery or windpipe is the mouth of the stomach. Holland.

2. One of a system of cylindrical vessels or tubes, membranous, elastic, and pulsatile, which convey the blood from the heart to all parts of the body, by ramifications which as they proceed diminish in size and increase in number, and terminate in minute capillaries uniting the ends of the arteries with the beginnings of the veins. There are two principal arteries: the aorta, which rises from the left ventricle and ramifies through the whole body; and the pulmonary artery, which conveys venous blood from the right ventricle to the lungs, to undergo respiration. An artery is composed of three coats: the outer consists of condensed cellular membrane, and is supplied with numerous blood-vessels and nerves; the middle coat consists of circular fibres, generally supposed to be muscular; the inner coat, thin, smooth, and dense, confines the blood within its canal, and facilitates its motion.

Artesian (är-tē'zi-an), a. [Fr. artésien, properly pertaining to Artois in France, also term descriptive of a particular kind of well.] 1. Of or belonging to Artois in France.—2. Term descriptive of a particular kind of well, believed to have been first used in Artois. An artesian well is a perpendicular boring into the ground through which water rises to the surface of the soil, producing a constant flow or stream. Artesian wells are generally sunk in plains and districts where the lower pervious strata are bent into basin-shaped curves. The rain falling on the outcrops of these saturates the whole porous bed, so that when the bore reaches it the water by hydraulic pressure rushes up towards the level of the highest portion of the stratum. Such wells are commonly of great depth, that at Grenelle, Paris, being 1800 feet deep, while another at Rochefort is 2765 feet.
